

STORM AT SEA.

DOUBLING CAPE HORN.

It was a night of storm and darkness off that terrific and never-to-be-forgotten head-land, Cape Horn.

Our noble frigate for the last ten days had been struggling against a heavy breeze from the south-west, and a tremendous head sea, without making an inch of progression towards the El Dorado of our hopes, the vine-wreathed shores of Chili.

Officers and men were becoming discontented and disheartened—the ship, with her sides loaded with ice, rolled hammock-nettings under and plunged madly into the great green hissing waves as they came thundering on like moving Appenines, deluging the decks with their briny spray.

The main deck was cold and cheerless, the long ranges of guns groaning and creaking in their breechings, as the huge, helpless vessel wallowed about in the yeast of waters—the men pinched by the severity of the weather pacing to and fro in little squads, endeavoring to keep themselves from freezing by beating their hands and arms against their sides.

At this time, I was tormented with a distressing ague in the face and was forced to keep my cot in the cockpit, and it was therefore with feelings of no ordinary pleasure that I heard, that the wind had at last hauled to the eastward, and that there was some prospect of our being able to double the Cape.

We had on board our ship as passengers, the minister from the Court of Brazil to the republic of Peru, and his interesting family, consisting of his wife—an English lady—a daughter, a girl of seventeen, and an infant son.

The daughter was one of the most beautiful and accomplished young ladies I ever saw. She possessed a remarkable fondness for the sea and sailors; and I have seen her sit for hours watching the great rolling waves, and the ever-varying expression of the heavens, with her sunny face beaming with admiration.

Such was the Senorita Florida de Lima, as perfect a specimen of female loveliness as ever emanated from the hand of Deity, to light this cheerless world.

I had turned into my cot one bitter cold night—that I shall never forget—with the pleasing anticipation of soon roaming on the shores of Chili.

The wind, for once was from the right quarter, and although it blew a violent gale, our huge ship staggered along under two double reefed top-sails, reefed fore-sail, and fore storm-stay-sail: at one moment rising on the crest of a mountain wave like a snow wreath, and the next buried in the watery and melancholy vale below.

In the place where I had my quarters, the sound of the howling gale on deck came very faintly to my ear, and lulled by the continued and monotonous roaring of the elements, I fell asleep.

I was not long in the land of dreams, before I was startled from my slumbers by my cot striking repeatedly and violently against the side of my room. Starting up, I was for a moment appalled. The swinging astral lamp that graced our apartment was extinguished, and all was as black as the pit of Acheron; but I could tell by the increased roaring on the deck, that the storm had broken out afresh, and by the ship lying down on her side, that it was from an adverse quarter. Occasionally could be heard the loud, shrill voice of the officer of the watch rising above the shrieking of the blast.

I soon found my way on deck, and the scene was truly one of sublimity and awful grandeur. The night was dark as Erebus, lighted only by the phosphoric crests of the giant billows, as they, roaring and hissing, dashed their summits on high, as if trying to sweep the sky.

The captain had rushed out of his cabin on deck in his night-clothes, and with his long gray hair streaming in the breeze, stood giving orders to the helmsman in an excited tone to put up the wheel and endeavor to keep the frigate off before the tornado, which howled and bellowed through the rigging, prostrating the ship almost on her beam ends, and sending torrents of freezing and briny spray in a ceaseless shower along the decks, and drenching the shivering and exhausted crew as they toiled at the weather main top-sail brace, endeavoring to brae in the main top-sail yard. The efforts of the men to square the yard were, however, fruitless, and the hands began to look with impatience for the first lieutenant, as he was known to be a man of great energy and decision of character in cases of great emergency, and had the entire confidence of all on board. He soon came up the hatchway, enveloped in a huge cloak, and after casting his eagle-glimpse around, and surveying the situation of affairs, took a trumpet and ascended the horse block.

'Ease away the top-sail halliards! round in the weather braces!' sounds clear and shrill above the roaring of the gale and the dashing of the billows. 'Man the top-sail bustlines, clew-lines, reef-tackles, and down-haul tackle!'

After an interval of a minute or two, the lieutenant in the gang-way answered, sharply, 'All manned, sir!'

'Let go the top-sail halliards! lay aloft, top-men, and stand by to close reef!'

The men by the light of the battle lanterns are seen scrambling up the almost horizontal rigging, and when all aloft, and clustering about the reef top-sail rigging, again the first lieutenant bails 'lay out! reef away!' until the unruly sheets of canvas are secured to their respective yards, when the top men descend to the deck.

Then is heard the piercing notes of the fife, and the 'stamp and go' of the crew as they swing along the heavy top-sails.

After the top-sails were reefed and hoisted, the frigate was got off before the wind, had darted away over the tortured ocean like an affrighted thing.

Swifter and swifter flew the gallant frigate; higher and higher swelled pouring billows, and over this wild scene of sublimity and grandeur the moon broke forth from the cold gray clouds, and looked sadly down, shedding a weird and spectral light upon what might well be called 'the hell of waters.'

In the midst of the storm, I observed that the Senor de Lima and his lovely daughter, tempted by the wild beauty of the scene, had ascended the poop, and were gazing upon the Alpine waves as they rose up under the stern of the ship, with evident admiration. Never shall I forget the almost angelic beauty of Florida, so, wrapped in a fur mantle, she stood holding on by the main-top mast back-stay, her feet bathed in the spectral moor-beams as she gazed on the magnificent but terrific scene before her.

There is a fascination in the face of an intellectual beauty when seen in the crowded and illuminated halls of fashion and folly; but how much more potent is the spell which fetters the beholder's admiration, when lovely woman is gazed upon amid the wild, rude scenes created by the hand of Nature. Like some lovely and blooming rose, whose fragrance seems far sweeter when it is beheld rearing its modest and peerless head alone in the depths of an impenetrable forest, her charms appear more highly coloured by contrast with the weird dark objects with which she is surrounded.

Thus appeared the Senorita Florida de Lima in that wild night of storm and terror off the dreaded headland of Cape Horn, seen by the struggling rays of a spectral moon.

There is something indescribably grand and awful in the appearance of a night storm at sea. The gray clouds flitting with lightning speed along the heavens—the alternate shrieking, howling and roaring of the gale as it hurries through the taunted, strained, and mazy wilderness of rigging—the frigate delving through the great black waves as they come roaring and hissing on, as though they were vast palls destined to enshroud us, all united to create a scene of sublimity that cannot be met with elsewhere.

I stood for a long time watching the aspects of the weather, until the ship's bell tolled the hour of midnight. At this moment, casting my eyes astern, I was sensible of an increase of darkness, and was at no loss to assign a cause for it: a mountain wave was rolling on board of us a-ster!

I had but just time to hear the officer of the watch cry through his trumpet, 'Hold on, for your lives—hold on! here, with a roar like the cataract of Niagara, the briny mass burst upon us, deluging the decks, and sweeping everything before it, which was not secured in the strongest manner possible.

I had twined my arms around the pipe-rail, and held on with all my might, yet when the torrent rushed past me, I thought I must be swept away by its irresistible force. Amid the rush of waters, I felt something brush past me, and instinctively put out one arm to arrest its progress to destruction. It was Senorita Florida de Lima. I grasped her arm with all my power, but it was in vain—she was swept from my hold, and I at the same time was dashed down the hatchway upon the main deck!

Day slowly dawned over the cheerless, gray and melancholy waste of waters. The gale had abated, and our lonely and shattered bark crept slowly and stealthily towards the shore of Chili. But where was she who once like the summer's sun shed warmth upon the heart of the ocean pilgrims, and cheered them with her presence to battle with storm? Gone—and the hearth of the Senor de Lima was desolate. She passed away in the bright May-day of her youth and happiness, ere the past could present one painful picture to her view—ere one green leaf was withered on the tree of her young existence; and she sleeps well, in that region of darkness and dread, but the music in the heart of her bereaved and stricken father is hushed forever.
