BY THE BOND STREET PROPHET. It was on Monday, September 16, in the the year of our Lord, 1900—a day in which all the villagers knew to be the one pre ceeding Thanksgiving.

Now, in my young days Thanksgiving used to come in the latter part f November, but as far as seventeen years back it them at length.

And she took a seat. Now she had time

It had been steadily growing dator, and now night has come on.

John Grub, sr., and his son and namesake, aged 30, sat in the kitchen of their little cottage.

And she took a seat. Now she had time to recognize the blushing John, jr., which she did by asking him in a solemn voice, how he was? for Maudy was not given to exhibiting her feelings in public.

Now, the meeting broke up, to go to supper and return the same exening.

Maudy and John, jr., walked behind the rest—John, jr., on the inside—Mrs. Grub, with a woman's forethought, had placed them so. little cottage.

The wife of the senior John and his one may judge from his extended mouth daughter were attending a political meet and smile, as he listened to his beloved days, and Mrs. Grub was industriously striving for her re-election to the legislalature. Her daughter was up for justice of the peace.

While the female portion of the family ing. Election was to take place in a few

While the female portion of the family were thus industriously employed, John Grub, sr., sat on the table making a dress slow work, and at the end of four years slow work, and at the end of four years slow work, and at the end of four years the held own head with but years little slow work, and at the end of four years for the youngest, while John, jr., was industriously employed in putting the aforesaid to sleep. His brothers and sisters had been to bed since dusk, but teething had ailed the little one, keeping it long awake. At length the three-months-old (they teethed younger in those days) child was asleep, and with a weary sigh John, jr. (my "heroine" as you have no doubt guessed), laid her in her-little crib.

John, jr., wore a sad expression on his Of course, it was given, and Maudy sealed the bargain by kissing John, and in lieu of a ring, put a gold circle around his

John, jr., wore a sad expression on his face. I will do him the justice to say that he bore his crushing secret with great fortitude, and no one outside his own family lieu of a ring, put a gold circle around his finger.

Then, Mrs. Grub, with an eye to the future, and knowing that they had been engaged long enough, proposed that they should be married before they attended the evening session, when she could have the pleasure of introducing the African traveler as their daughter-in-law.

The Rev. Mrs. Van Cott was called in, and Maudy Baker promised "to love, cherish and support, and take John, jr., for better or worse."

So, John, jr.'s face wore a happy expression that night, as he heard his lord and master speak so splendidly of her adventures. ever thought he had more than a passing thought for Maudy Baker, who had left him so unceremoniously on that Thankagiving; lon g ago. They were to be married on that day, but Maudy resolved that she'd go out in the world and bring back with her a fortune—no matter when it would be.

Perhaps he was thinking of all this. At any rate he sighed, and taking a worn and yellow letter from his pocket, he read it and sighed again. Luckily his day's work was done, also that his father was inclined for silence. for silence.

hair on his face. Habit and surroundings had given him that sheepish look, and as for gold, things have turned around these days, so he hadn't much.

If one were to judge from the handwriting of Maudy Baker, you would be apt to say that she was masculine enough to make up for her "better-half" (that was

Not a word had she spoken in that little kitchen for some time kitchen for some time.

At last Join, sr., mildly intimated, looking up at the clock, that it was about the usual time that "Mrs." Grub arrived home, Even as she spoke the hall door opened,

"Good night, Miss Trump, and don't forget the meeting at the town hall tomorrow night. Miss De Boney (she that yoted for the abolition of woman's assuming her husband's name, but which was lost by two giggling girls), is to speak on the coming woman. I wouldn't miss it for a dollar, and don't you. See George Francis Train Davis home. Come, Susan B. Anthony Grub, we must be to bed to prepare for to-morrow night, by having a refreshing sleep," and before Miss Trump could reply, she, by the way, in an unusual good humor, having beaten Miss Loudnouth in getting the nomination for "assembly woman," dragged the robust ood night, Miss Trump, and don't woman," dragged the robust usan B., etc., after her, and shut the and Mrs. Grub mildly intimated that things should be wound up for the night. With a happy smile on each of their countenances, John, sr. and jr., readily complied, and the next minute they were ready to go to bed.
