Protection and Home Rule.

any say either that Protection has ally a Home Rule character about it, iversely, that Home Rule is pretty will protection. Few will ure to work towards Protection. Few will enture to deny that Canada's N. P. Act of combined both characters to a remark-e degree. It affirmed the principle of etection for Canada, and in doing so it lared substantially for Home Rule. This world has been constantly asserting The World has been constantly asserting during the comparatively few years of its existence; we have kept harping away on the fact that in declaring for Protection Canada had virtually made her declaration of Commercial Independence. While The Globe and other blind lead rs of the blind amongst us were howling away about the right to make our own commercial treaties, The World kept pointing out that the thing had been sutstantially conceded already, and that Sir Char'es Tupper, as far as Canada's commercial relations with Spain and her dependencies were concerned, was practically a Minister to Madrid with full powers. It is most unquestionable that Protection and Home Rule have come together in Canada.

If already Massachusetts and Pennsylvania find it inonvenient commercially to keep house together, what would be the result of an apt to tie Canada to the whole United States? Better let us paddle our own canoe. In other words—let us try the same policy by which our neighbors have done so well. But as soon as we begin to do well by it, you want us to drop and to hand it all over to the United States. That would be a surrender of our Home Rule; and Canada is not prepared for that, we beg to inform you. Now, to make Protection, Home Rule and National Policy all chime in together. We
