FRISCO OF PAST AND PRESENT

To start again in the desolate city of one's nativity after year-long wanderings in the world's distant quarters, to revisit the ghost-haunted glimpses of a dead epoch, and to gaze for the first time upon the tragic traces of an immense disaster is an experience rarely, beyond ordinary chance or adventure. Unusually thoughts grip the brain, and strange emotions grip the heart of the beholder.

How remote, to the returned wanderer seem even the immediate past, how near and as it were of yesterday, the day preceding the severe of his absence! On viewing again the old and well-known place, the mind seems strangely bent on leaping over the intervening gap of interruption in time and space and connecting the obtrusive present with the distant perspective of the past. This tendency is furthered in its effect by the refreshing sight of "old familiar faces and old familiar places." These erase the reality and the verity of much that is delectable in the fancy, and there is the native returning to San Francisco finds most of the familiar places gone near and many of the dear familiar faces driven far from him.

Most of the visitors to the returned city of the future came to look upon people and the place, and such display only the tourist's curiosity in the ruins. Then they pass on to the Farther East or return to the Atlantic states.

NOT NECESSARILY SHOCKING.

The first sight of what remains of the charred corpse and demolished adornment of the once dappled city is not necessarily shocking, nor even surprising. Once the aspect was terrible, but now new life and hope have risen from the ruins. To anyone in particular a native, equipped with a suggestive imagination and supplied during absence with photographs personal accounts and printed descriptions, the city appeared even as such a one might have mentally pictured it. True, the facts of reality, but seldom fit the notions of the fancy, and there is always the inevitable readjustment of erroneous suppositions and the correction of misconceptions which these are formed by the mind instead of the eye and ear. It was easily evident at the first representative panoramic survey how vast had been the havoc and horror and devastation whereof the mute yet eloquent evidence was everywhere. Yet, upon this realm of destruction, this domain of doom, much of the new has been imposed, blatant, brilliant and sensational by contrast with its setting and its background. That which one no longer saw one did not irrationally miss, and it was only when memory reconstructed the old scenes, and then in turn brought back the old associations, that one grew sadly rueful, and mused in the inevitable contrast between the old and the new, the truthfulness of all human endeavor.

THE RUINS OF THE CITY.

One might easily, from some commanding eminence of the city have amused Marius as he mourned over the ruins of Carthage. Nearly all the towering masses of brick and stone blackened by flame, and rent from base to cornice with zigzag fissures and yawning cracks, made by the earthquake, had been razed long ago. Signs of patching and repair were visible upon the fronts of many of the mighty buildings whose exteriors had in a measure survived the ocean of fire that engulfed the city. There in a waste of fallen brick, most melancholy and forlorn, indeed, were their mere graves and ghosts of once strong and populous edifices.

WONDERFULLY IMPRESSIVE.

The gigantic, untouched ruin of the City Hall, once the largest civic building in the world, is wonderfully impressive and picturesque. That mighty heap of rotten masonry, resolved at the first quivering of the earth into its original shape, and now a mass of broken pillars and covered with ivy, it might become even romantic—something more dignified in form than the Roman Forum. As it is a fit symbol of the depraved, disorganized government it once housed, and furnishes the best and bitterest moral upon its own dishonest construction. For all that, it is inspiring to see the huge bronze statue of San Francisco standing straight and unfettered, above the curve of the lofty dome, still holding on high the torch of hope and courage. She still stands undauntedly in the brave sunlight, as she stood above the battling flames, looking upon the doomed city at her feet.

SIGNS OF CHANGE.

Van Ness avenue, once select and aristocratic, is now "the fashionable shopping centre, and Filmore street, the heart of the undercurrent western trade, is a roaring hive of trade, showy and obtrusive in color and display by day, dazzling with electric signs at night. The superb width of Van Ness avenue enabled the freer traffic to make a successful stand against the configuration that advanced westward like an infernal army, little more than a year ago.

The Latin Quarter about the base and slopes of historic Telegraph Hill, once a place of the most elegant and aristocratic, once an elegant driveway to the park of the same name, has been degraded into a street of the most vulgar and sordid character, and the splendid element of the heights, when the moon is in the cloudless sky, accents full of a sombre sublimity present themselves.

GRACE CHURCH.

Upon the fire-swept apex of a noble hill rise in majesty the pointed arches and broken buttresses of Grace Church, a soft, dark mass, touched by the moonlight into vague relief against the luminous indigo of the heavens. Melrose Abbey or Elgin Cathedral are scarcely more full of intrinsic charm and poetry than these romantic ruins in a city that has, with all its vicissitudes, not yet reached the averagefulness of many years. Not far distant from the church the great hollow shell of a millionaire's browstone palace stands sullenly on its lofty eminence, the couchant lions of marble still guarding the massive portals, the still guarding the massive portals, the empty window openings framing the stars that peer into the roofless interior. At times the yelling sea-fog comes with all their mystery; then even the day is full of the softened magic of a beautiful transformation.

By order, R. C. DESROCHES, Asst. Secretary, Department of Public Works.

Ottawa, July 15, 1908.

Newspapers will not be paid for this advertisement if they insert it without authority from the Department. 21-7-11.

Now, not even the shadows were left, though it seemed such tricks done (fancy) as if of deceptive mirages or pictures of fate morgan hung in the air—the air that is joint possessor with the earth of all the memories of the past—or as if one heard weary whistles of a quiet respectable antiquity. Houses and buildings and rooms—once materially separated and enclosed spaces of cubical space—now, so to speak, unenclosed and liberated into the empty, universal air, an utter death and annihilation to eyes of flesh.

DEAD AND SILENT STREETS.

The streets, save where some tall landmark had survived the holocaust, were unrecognizable. Sutter street might well have passed for Turk, or Eddy for Fell. Along Market street the main artery of the city, there flowed a current of traffic, but the side streets were strangely dead and silent.

When wandering through them one was strongly reminded of the accented solitude of the deserted streets of ancient Pompeii. The downtown thoroughfares of San Francisco are padded with earth and dust, and so all sounds of traffic are muffled; no rolling of wheels is heard, no beating of horses' hoofs. The streets in certain sections possess the quiet of country lanes. Grass sprouts along the base of crumbling walls, and weeds are rampant amidst the debris.

Some of the high hills in the once-populous district south of Market St. have reverted to a state of nature, and the wild flowers long dispossessed, have come into their own heritage once more. The jangling cable-cars, with their beating gears, no longer clamor through the streets, but in their stead electric trains glide swiftly, almost

Yonder formerly arose the bulk of a splendid hotel, a true microcosm in each of whose innumerable chambers for many years what human comedies and tragedies had not been enacted!
