AN EVENING SKETCH.

The birds have ceased their song,
All save the black cap, that, amid the boughs
Of you tall ash tree, from his mellow throat,
In sad fusion of the setting sun,
Chants forth his evening hymn.

'Tis twilight now,
The sovereign sun behind his western hills
In glory hath one'ined. The mighty clouds,
Kissed by his warm allegiance, hang around
In all their empurpled hues of pride.
Lake pillars of some tabernacle grand,
Worthy his own magnificence; while the sky,
Radiant in its native azure, glows
Changing as sunshine and star is sold.
How deep is the tranquility of the hour,
As the chainless thought through the multitude of tongues,
A twilight gloom pervades the distant hills,
The entire solitude rising to the sky.
The fisherman runs to the yellow shore
His laden craft and in the sheltering bend,
Behind you rocky point, his shallop moors,
Then sits down on the portion shaded from the sun.

The air is rivulets, as I love each
And sheltering hill—without a ripple spreads
Its bosom, silent, and immense—the hum
Of toil (so that we love to listen) is hushed,
And all is calm in sunless majesty.
With blooming branches round, yon village
Is changed to one of jolly inn trees, silhouette
Towering in soft wreaths to the soft sky.
The smoke from many a cheerful hearth ascends,
All joy in ether.

Darkness o'er the face of the deep
Broods, and the evening star illumines the blue south.
Twinkling in love-tones. Oh! holy star,
Thou bright dispenser of the twilight dews,
Then herald of Night's sparkling galaxy,
And harbinger of social bliss! how oft,
Amid the twilights of departed years,
Resting beside the river's mirrored stream,
On trunk of mossy oak, with eyes upturn'd
To thee in admiration, hast sat,
Dreaming sweet dreams till earth-born turbulence
Was all forgot; and thinking that in thee,
Far from the vastness of this jarring world,
These might be realms of quiet happiness!

Blackwood's Magazine.

Our London Letter—Life in the World's Metropolis.

LONDON, July 20th, 1874.

Those who love betting, and of these there are not a few in London, are seriously perturbed at the conviction of the landlord of a tavern for allowing betting to take place on his premises. The conviction places in jeopardy everybody who allows the practice, and it is stated that it is just possible the Act will be made to apply to the noble owner of a celebrated race course in which races, far famed for their splendor, will shortly be held. As for the betting men of London, it will be of some consolation to those who detest their erratic manner of obtaining a living to know that they are getting more seedy in appearance, and that they find fewer foolish persons to prey upon.

THE COACH TAX.

The coach builders of London have a grievance just now which they are ventilating with all their might and main. They object to paying the taxes on the coaches which they let out, and submit that the arrangement is one which causes them great annoyance and trouble. They say they have no right to be made collectors of revenue at a loss to themselves, and they assert that the obligation injures their trade. Mr. Lowe refused to make any alteration in the system which he himself introduced, and now the coach builders are doing what they can with Sir Stafford Northcote, who, however, seems to be dealt equally with the late Chancellor. There is likely to be a debate in Parliament on the subject.

THREE-PENNY CONTRIBUTIONS.

At the Church of St. Mary Magdalen, Paddington, on Sabbath last, the incumbent, the Rev. J. T. West, gave his "dearly-beloved tidy-hearers" a good wigging, in quite novel style. He complained of the large number of three-penny pieces they put in the collection boxes, and then went on to denounce the "tidy" hair which they wear. He told them that if they saved the money which they spent upon the tresses cut from corpses, and put the money into the aforesaid boxes, it would be a good thing for them. As it was they owed him £800, which he strongly exhorted them to pay.

PRINCE LOUIS AND THE CZAR.

When the Czar was in London he invited the Prince Imperial to pay him a visit at St. Petersburg. It was at the same time intimated that this is an act of courtesy in return for the hospitality which was shown to the Czar by the Prince's father seven years ago, and must not be considered to have any political bearing. The Czar will not interfere in the internal government of France, but will recognize any settled authority. However, it is hardly probable that Alexander would have taken the trouble to go to Chiselhurst, and to ask the youth to visit him if he had not thought it probable that the said youth would one day be living in the restored Tuileries.

A PRELATE'S DEATH.

Monsignor de Merode, one of the Pope's ablest associates, has just died. He came of a most distinguished and wealthy family, with which the illustrious Montalembert was allied. He was a strong Ultramontane, and the Pope has been greatly affected by his death. He was 72 years of age.

THE LORD MAYOR'S BANQUET.

The invitations to the Lord Mayor's banquet are now all issued and the acceptances have come in. To attend that banquet it is amazing to what expedients people of the highest rank have resorted. Nearly all the greatest celebrities of the opera in London will be present, and most of the leading writers of the day. The line appears to have been drawn at actors, of whom not one, I believe, is invited. As regards the rest of the company, it is stated that the Perfect of the Seine, the Burgomaster of Brussels, and several other chief citizens of great towns will be present. Sir Arthur Helps, Secretary of the Privy Council, is amongst the guests. I will be the sole Canadian representative.

AN ART QUESTION.

One of the questions agitating the public mind of London at the present time is, "Whether there exists a varnish which will not, when applied to their paintings, destroy them." If all that is said on the subject is to be believed, there can be no hope for a single specimen of the old masters in the National Gallery or elsewhere. The moment a preparation is suggested, there is immediately the cry that it would eat up all the glories of ancient art. They are, therefore, reduced to a fearful dilemma. If the paintings are let alone they will spoil; if they are varnished with any known varnish they will also spoil. After a great deal of discussion two varnishes still hold up their heads, so to speak, unconquered in all their supposed hues of purity.

Riot, Robbery and Murder.

There is said to be an alarming prevalence, just now, of riot, robbery and murder in the coal regions of Pennsylvania. Recently at Centralia a number of persons were shot in a riot, several of them fatally, Shamokin last week was the scene of a brutal murder. Almost every day some citizen receives a Ku-Klux notice to the effect that he must govern his
