"The twentieth," he said, dropping the letter into her lap. "It will be a big affair evidently, for there must be a good many London people staying at Barmister just now," and he leaned against the mantelshelf with his hands in his pockets and a faint smile on his lips.

He was thinking that he had not yet danced with Constance, and that on the twentieth he should do so.

CHAPTER XX. Not even the prospect of a dance at the Duchess of Barmister's could add to Constance's happiness, and she would willingly have forgone it, should have exchanged it for, say, an evening stroll on the terrace with her lover by her side, her arm within his, listening to him as he talked, and watching the smoke as it floated from the cigar which, like a wise woman, she not only permitted him, but insisted upon his smoking.

There had come to Constance one of those epochs which the gods in their mercy sometimes vouchsafe to the sons and daughters of men—a period of perfect happiness—so perfect, that sometimes she seemed to wake with a start and ask herself what she had done to deserve such bliss, and whether it were not too good to be true.

The marquis's love surrounded and hedged her about like a magic circle, which at its end everything that was evil or scaramous. Scarcely a day passed but he planned something for her delectation and amusement. He had bought a beautiful little turn out with a pair of ponies for her, and with Arold she drove about the place in the lovely autumn weather, the marquis sometimes in the trap with them or riding the chestnut beside it. And if she was not driving her ponies she was riding the mare, which was now her very own, and of which she was as fond as any becomes of an animal which is part and parcel of one's love story.

Yes, she was perfectly happy, and her joy was intensified by the consciousness that it was shared by the man she loved. The marquis, who rode and drove beside the beautiful girl, his future wife, was indeed a very different man from the one who had returned home prodigal fashion, on that summer night. There was no frown on his brow now, no sadness in his voice or eyes; and often and often the villagers who saw him pass their gates declared that he had grown like the bright, light-hearted youth they remembered years ago.

Constance would have done without the ball very well, and sighed out the confession in her lover's ear, but he had laughingly assured her that there was no escape.

"The dear old lady has got the affair up in your honor, my dearest, and so we must. I think you'll like her Constance. She is about as unlike the popular idea of a duchess as can well be."

"I know. That is the way the article draw them in the paper. Her Grace of Barmister is just the opposite. She is rather thin, the very embodiment of simplicity and good nature, quite un-proud."

"What a word!" "Yes; and rather rollicking than otherwise; as for feathers, I don't think she ever wears them excepting when she goes to Court. By the way, dearest, she will be delighted to meet you."

Constance gave a little start. Twenty times a day she was reminded by some such chance word of the greatness that had befallen her.

"I don't know any one more popular than the duchess," he said, "excepting it is the duke. He is a very jolly old fellow. Goes in for farming and breeding storthorses. He has over and over again been mistaken for his own ballif, and once a stranger actually did offer him a sovereign for taking him to see a prize bull; it will give you a notion of his jollity when I tell you he wasn't a bit offended."

"This is quite a new idea of a duke," said Constance, laughing.

"Yes; it is one of the queerest sights in the world to see the pair of them going the round of the home farm; the duchess in a short-skirt and thick boots and the duke in a farmer's rough coat and thick gaiters. They are as happy as the day is long, as happy as we shall be when we are married, made-noise!"

Constance nestled a little closer. "And I tell you what; I think I shall go in for just the same kind of life. You might ask the duchess where she buys her boots and I will order a suit like the duke's. Oh, yes, of course we must go. And do you know, I am looking forward to it? Of course, you'll dance every dance with me, Constance?"

"She laughed and blushed. "I may not dance more than one, I think," she said. "I'll ask the marquis. It would be dreadful if I did anything wrong on such an occasion. I shall be on my best behaviour, you will see."

"You?" he said, cheerfully. "But that was just what Constance did not want. She knew that if he were with her she could not buy what she wanted, and she had quite made up her mind what she wanted to buy. The marchioness guessed in a moment why she wanted to go alone, and came to her assistance."

"Go and see Goodman's barn, Wolfe dear, and let Constance alone," she said, smiling.

"Oh, very well," he retorted. "Why didn't you say you didn't want me?" "I'm too proud to force my society upon any one," and as he sauntered out of the room to order his horse, he took her hand in his and turned up her face that he might look into her eyes and kiss her.

"You are going to buy your dress, dear?" said the marchioness.

"Yes," replied Constance. "And may I not go with you?" asked the old lady, gently.

Constance shook her head. "No, dear," she said, blushing.

"Too proud to let your mother give you a stupid dress for your dance, my dear?" asked the old lady, with a smile.

Constance nodded.

A Common Affliction Permanently Cured by Taking AYER'S Sarsaparilla. A CAB-DRIVER'S STORY. "I was afflicted for eight years with Salt Rheum. During that time, I tried a great many remedies which were highly recommended, but none gave me relief. I was at last advised to try Ayer's Sarsaparilla by a friend who told me that it would cure me. I bought six bottles, and used them according to directions. I yielded to the persuasion, bought the six bottles, and took the contents of three of them, but without noticing any effect. Before I had finished the fourth bottle, my hair was falling out, and my face was covered with eruptions. As ever they were. My business, which is that of a cab-driver, requires me to be out in cold and wet weather, often without gloves, and the trouble has never returned."—THOMAS A. JOHNSON, Bradford, Ont.

Free from Eruptions as ever they were. My business, which is that of a cab-driver, requires me to be out in cold and wet weather, often without gloves, and the trouble has never returned.

whisper. "So you like it?" said Constance, with a shy smile, when they had reached the security of the drawing-room.

"Like it?" he returned, looking at her wistfully, and seeming to drink in the loveliness of form and face. "My child, do you know how beautiful you are? Why, it is simply perfect! Why didn't you wear it before? Why did you reserve it for this crowd-to-night?"

Constance laughed at him, her whole frame shaking with pure, honest pleasure at his admiration. "Why, it only came home, this after-noon!" "That's why you wanted to go to Berrington—and by yourself. I see," he said. "Dearest, I don't know which I am suffering from most—sight, love or pride. Mother, look at her!" and he caught the arm of the marchioness as she entered; "Isn't she lovely?" "I always said so," retorted the old lady, placidly, but looking at Constance with loving admiration. "My dear, it is simply exquisite. Ah, you were right!" "Why was she right? What do you mean?" he demanded.

A Strong and Happy Assurance. Paine's Celery Compound Positively and Permanently Cures. Men and Women Made Strong For the Hot Weather. If the Doctors Have Failed to Give You Health, Paine's Celery Compound Will Meet Your Case—Your Blood Will Be Thoroughly Cleansed—Your Nervous System Will Be Strengthened—You Will Feel Bright and Happy. There ought to be no necessity of continually reminding people that they should look closely to their condition of health at this season of the year. Notwithstanding constant warnings thousands seem to be quite indifferent to what they term the small ills of life. Small streams make mighty, rushing rivers; the small ills of life, when neglected, frequently bring on dangerous maladies that end in death. The trifles of to-day—weak and deathly feelings, nervous twitching, dizziness, sleeplessness, tired feelings, and heavy dull pain in the head—may to-morrow result in dread disease, paralysis, insanity, or that awful pestilence that ends life so quickly. This is indeed the time when Paine's Celery Compound should be used by old and young who feel they are not up to the standard of full health, strength and activity. The hot, enervating weather of summer will soon overtake the weak, languid and broken-down. The results must be appalling and fatal to thousands, if the system is not fortified by earth's best medicine, Paine's Celery Compound. The fact that Paine's Celery Compound has met the most sanguine expectations of physicians, and cured so many in the past, should be the strongest and happiest assurance to those who need a life-giving medicine at the present time. That Paine's Celery Compound cures positively and permanently all diseases arising from impure blood, or from decline of vigor in the nervous system, is fully proved by the thousands of earnest and happy men and women who have signed letters to that effect. Let us kindly urge every individual, young and old, who is out of condition, to make trial of one bottle of Paine's Celery Compound. The results will be astonishing, convincing and gladdening. No other medicine in the world like it for pure, rich blood, and for bestowing that robust health that can successfully cope with the dangers that have to be encountered in mid-summer. Beware of imitations and substitutes, make you get "Paine's" the kind that makes people well.
