THILE she worked, or strolled about with her hands in her pockets, she often watched him, without his being aware of it, and the difference between him and the other man was more strongly mpressed upon her day by day. It seemed to her that his companions yielded him a kind of reluctant respect mixed with fear. Like herself, he worked when it pleased him, and never with that feverish eagerness and excitement which were displayed by the

One morning he fell into one of hi bsent-minded fits, and after leaning on his pick for some minutes looking before him vacantly, he threw the tool aside and strode away. After a minute or two Cottie followed him in a casual fashion, and she met him as he was coming out of the hut. He had his gun under his arm, and his face was dark and gloomy.

'Are you going shooting, Geoffrey? she said. 'I'll come and pick up the affected cheerfulness; but she watched him from the cottage window with a vague sense of uneasiness. He had often had fits of silence and abstraction, when he would sit beside the fire with his head in his hand and his thoughts evidently far away; but she had never before known him to go off in this way. She went back to the men; it happened to be dinnerhour, and they were talking as they lay on their sides and munched.

'Geoff's gone off with his gun,' Cottie heard Moser say, as she threw herself down at a little distance. 'I saw him go along the ridge just now,

'Got a black fit on him,' said War ner, laconically. 'Been coming on this last day or two: I know the sign. When you see him staring at the sky and looking as if he were milles away. then you know what's up. At such times I don't hanker for conversation with Geoff.'

'Got something on his mind,' said Moser, thoughtfully. 'I knew a chap once that 'ud killed his man. It didn't seem to affect him at the time, but a few months afterwards he took to queen ways, just like Geoff here; used to ge off like he does, and wander about no one knew where. Used to drink a bit, like Geoff does; not so much for the fun of the thing, but as it he'd got something on his mind he wanted to forget.'

Shouldn't be surprised if that was the case with Geoff,' said Warner, with a yawn. 'You can't tell what he's been and done; he's the sort of chap to do anything if his monkey was up-not that he's easily riled, Ill say that for him. Then, he's a gentleman; and I've noticed that a good many of the gentlemen are over here for some reason or other that they never tell. Snouldn't be surprised if there was a kind of mystery

'You'd better ask him,' suggested Warner, ironically.

'Not me!' retorted Moser. that I'm afraid of him,' he added. But he was, and so were the rest of the men. 'I don't poke my nose into any man's business: got quite enough to attend to my own. Time's up! Now, young 'un, you take that pick and fall to; we're short-handed.' Cottie rose and walked away deliberately.

· I've got something else to do,' she said, with all a boy's audacity: Moser glared after him.

'That darned young beggar's getting too sarcy,' he growled. 'I've a goom mind to knock his head off."

when he came back. Better let him alone his work don't amount to much; half the time he's mooching about. Boys will be boys!

Cottie went up to the hut and ousied herself about the rooms; but every now and then she paused in her work, and standing motionless, gave herself up to thought: of course she was thinking of Geoff.

men. A gentleman : she scarcely knew pleasantly than an ordinary digger. see, whatever he had been good to her, had protected her from the men until this morning had always been gentle and kind.

When her work was done, she went along the ridge in the hope of seeing him, or of hearing his gun; but there was no sight nor sound of him. The day passed and the night came on, and he did not return. The night was chilly; and she made up a large fire and cooked him as dainty a supper as she could; but the darkness closed in the silence of the forest followed upon the sounds of the working-day, and still he did not come. Her loneliness weighed upon her, and she grew a little frightened by the solitude and the stillnesss. She would not go to bed, lest he should come in tired and hungry and want food; and she threw herself down on the rug, feeling very miserable and deserted; but presently she fell asleep--and reamt of him; dreamt that she saw

She woke with a start. The mornng had come, and the sun was stream ng through the window, and Geoffrey was not there. She went about her household duties with a heavy heart, for sine was smitten by the fear that he might not come back at all. She prepared the breakfast, but she could eat nothing, for her heart was like lead and the tears were very near her eyes; but suddenly she heard his step. It was a long way off, but her ears were naturally sharp and had been trained until they were as keen as an Indian scout's. The step was a slow and dragging one, but the sound of it brought joy to her heart which drove

But she dashed them away quickly t would never do to let him see that she was fretting; she must seem cheerful, as if she had not noticed that anything was the matter; and she began to sing as she boiled the kettle and toased the damper. She heared him pause outside the door, as if he were listening, and when he at last came in she did not turn her head, but said, cheerfully:

HEALTH, WEALTH, AND WORK.

So long as Nature's laws require that markind shall work, the necessity of keeping one's self in health and strength is of first importance. Many people believe that men of great wealth 60 nothing. That is a mistaken idea. They may not work with hammers or shovels, Lat they work with their nerves, brains and minds. Scores of millionaires have porked themselves into nervous prosation in their efforts to control, to avoilosing, their millions. But it is the amble workers who suffer most. Mr. Arvez Berten, of Robertville, Glouester Co., N.B., is a sturdy man of 65 who works in the lumbering districts in winter, and who, therefore, must have good health. Some years ago, he suifered much from Dyspepsia, with headsches, dizziness and rheumatism. In a statement, dated June 24th, 'og, he 317 he used only Mother Seigel's Syrup and four bottles cured him completely.

He put the gun in a corner and threw some birds on the tab'e, then sank into a chair. Glancing at him, she saw that he was pale and haggard; there was dark shadows under his 'I wouldn't,' remarked Warner, eyes, she knew, as well as if he had coolly: Geoff would knock yours off told her, that he had been tramping all night. He drank a cup of tea and ate a mouthful or two; but he soon pushed his plate away and sat gazing at the fire moodily.

A boy or man would have plagued him with questions, but Cottie, with that wisdom of the serpent with which her sex is endowed, asked no questions, and appeared to be unaware of his dejection. Presently he said, without raising his head:

'What was that you were singing when I came in? 'Was I singing? she asked, cheerfuly. 'Oh, I don't know. Something I'd picked up from one of then me in Paradise Camp. Was this it?'.

After a second of shyness, against which she fought for his sake, she began to sing "Kathleen Mayour-
