A New Use for Cows.

The Australasian: The sheep with horns in its teeth is not unknown in Victoria, but in North Queensland a cow with a hobby for collecting minerals has been discovered. The interesting beast was in perfect health when slaughtered, yet in her stomach were found 48 stones of various sizes. Some contained gold, others silver and tin. It was a fine specimen which was stamped the cow as an ex-Kaiser. The cow was a specimen of the breed which was developed under proper conditions. The cow might be trained to follow the specimens she picks up but bring them to her owner in a bag tied round her neck. Prospecting would then receive a much needed impetus. The search for gold in these luckless days would prove more alluring if each prospector had a cow in his outfit. Even if the cow did not succeed in bringing rich specimens to camp each evening she could be milked. And if she did not yield much milk she would be handy to swear at.

A Philadelphia despatch of July 14 says: "Local health authorities tonight said that Nicholas Foniadakis, a leper, who escaped from a Boston hospital on May 21, was found working in a restaurant in this city last Friday and was isolated in the Philadelphia hospital for contagious diseases on Saturday. Foniadakis said he came from Greece eight years ago after escaping from Boston, he said, he worked in a restaurant in New York, and later came to this city.

Welcome for the Prince.

(From the Boston Transcript.)
When the grandfather of the present Prince of Wales, afterward King Edward VII, visited the United States in the year 1860 as 'Lord Renfrew,' he was received with immense enthusiasm in every part of the country that he visited, including Boston. The "Prince's ball" at New York was a nine years' wonder. Acclaiming crowds followed the Prince, who was then an agreeable lad in his nineteenth year. The Civil War had not yet come. The relations between Great Britain and the United States had settled down to a condition of amity. No cloud darkened the brightness of the welcome of the young Prince. After nearly sixty years, it is possible that the United States will be visited by another Prince of Wales. The eldest son and heir of the English King will visit Canada next month, and is expected to drop across the border and take at least an informal run through a part of the United States. The young Prince, if he comes, will be welcome. There is every reason that he should be. We are on terms of earnest understanding and co-operation with the country which he represents. After a hundred years of peace, America and Britain have fought side by side in a great war. The cordiality with which some hundreds of thousands of Americans have been received in Britain would in itself be a pledge of hearty welcome to the heir to Britain's throne. The Prince of Wales is, moreover, entitled to welcome quite on his own account. He is apparently not a young man of the brilliant personal qualities of his grandfather, Edward VII, whose social graces were many. Though the present Prince of Wales is in his twenty-fourth year, he seems younger than his grandfather at nineteen. He is, however, a level headed young man, who has been by all accounts a diligent if rather slow student, and he has just had the severest training that any Prince could have—the training of actual participation in a long and terrible war. It is probable that in brain and temperament he resembles his father more than his grandfather. Like George Fifth, he will doubtless make a model constitutional sovereign. But he is fortunate in the act that his father is likely to live in solid health a considerable number of years longer, till the storms of "unrest" are over. These are perilous days for royalty everywhere. The British Crown is not visibly menaced. It is undoubtedly the safest in the world; but no one knows what a day in the affairs of nations may bring forth.

THE GENTLE LANES.
Let me tread the gentle lanes
Where the kindly people are.
Where the light from window panes
Gleams and glistens from afar;
Let me walk with men I know,
Never haughty, seldom great,
And I've strength for every blow
And a friend for every fate.

Let me hear the laughter ring
That proclaims the simple joys,
Let me share the chattering
Of a pack of girls and boys;
Let me live among the men
Who are toiling, day by day
And I shan't be friendless, when
Care and sorrow come my way.

Let me sit awhile and rest
In the fellowship and cheer
Of the men I like the best;
Men of useful service here.
Strong of arm and brown of face,
Hands that shape and build and mold.
For in their abiding place
Life is rich with more than gold.

Not in places high or low
Dwells the courage of the race;
Many glorious blossoms grow
In a soil that's common place;
And it's on the simple lanes
That the men of worth are found
There it is that kindness reigns
There the joys of life abound.

"Let Us Have Peace."

Thanks to the Divine assistance to our righteous cause, we have won the victory and written the terms of defeat for our enemies to sign. Now, in the words of General Grant, at the close of another great war:—"Let us have peace!" For four years living and trading conditions in the free countries have been upset to a serious extent. It will take much patience, some time, possibly even suffering to get back to pre-war conditions. We won a marvellous victory over Germany's stupendous military preparedness, by our unity of purpose and our high ideas. The unrest at present existing, a serious aftermath of the war, will be overcome, let us hope, in like fashion. Wages will have to fall, probably; so, certainly, full profits. Patience and quietness, unity of desire for the restfulness and progress peace alone can bring, and loyalty to our free institutions will bring us safely past all the difficulties which lie before us. Greater production in every line of industry is also a necessity. How to set all the wheels of moving again is a problem. The solving of which may well begin with the basic industry of agriculture.

A well fed world is much more likely to advance comfortably and happily than a world in which crusts and rinds of existence are to be coveted and fought after.—Montreal Weekly Star.
