WEDNESDAY EV'G. SEPT. 9. 1868.
The Braes of Yarrow

An Historical Tale of the Sixteenth Century.

"I doubt that you have dealt too promptly with that troublesome varlet, Spens," muttered the Earl gloomily.
"If I have done wrong," returned Barras deprecatingly, "your lordship's will and zeal for his Majesty's safety must bear the brunt of it. But not this varlet whom we have disposed of. Condemned traitor, and did we not capture him in the very act of the high offence to carry off, perhaps to assassinate, his Majesty?"
"Un—I am not sure that under the present state of affairs his Majesty might not have preferred a sojourn at Sterling with Arran and the rest to his residence here with his Royal mother and myself!"
Captain Lindsay, re-entring the chamber from the King's apartment.
"His Majesty desires me to present his apologies to your lordship." Angus interrupted the Captain with a haughty gesture of the hand.
"Enough, enough, I will return in an hour, when his Majesty may be more at leisure." The Gentlemen of the Guard saluted his lordship as he retired with his attendants.
"We must wait until your Majesty does not involve us in any difficulty," said Angus, as he passed with impatient steps along the corridor.
"Close the doors, gentlemen," said Captain Lindsay brusquely; "the King will see no one to-night."
They had scarcely resumed their positions when the door of the main corridor was thrown violently open and a gentleman, wearing their own gay uniform, rushed in wildly.
Master Elliot! exclaimed Captain Lindsay, amazed by the abrupt entrance and errand of his young friend.
"Captain, I want to see the King," cried Gilbert excitedly.
"It is impossible."
"I must see him, Captain, I must see him."
"Do not speak so loud, sir, if you please," said the Captain sternly.
"I will speak in any way you would have me, or in any way I can," exclaimed Gilbert alternately pouting, frowning, and smiling.
"I feel my brain on fire, and I cannot answer for myself. Captain Lindsay, will you let me see the King?"
The Captain shook his head, as if sorry, but he spoke firmly.
"Master Elliot, I can guess what it is you wish to see the King for; and I would like to help you, for I, too, respect the Knight of Halstead. But the King has only a few minutes since refused to see the Earl of Angus.
Gilbert passed his trembling hand over his heated brow.
"But Angus has time to wait," he cried, and raising his voice hoarsely, "but I—I have no time to wait—no, no, no, a thousand times no, I cannot wait."
"You forget, where you are, sir," said the Captain sternly.
Gilbert's frenzy overcame him.
"Can I help that? I have appealed to everybody for help, and everybody repulses me. I have only one hope left. I come here to see the King, and I will see the King." Fervidly, you do not know me or you would not stay me—me who arrested Spens, me who have risked my life for the King's pleasure. The King is in there, and I will enter there. Must I pass over your body?"
"Draw, gentlemen, and defend your post!" Twelve swords leapt from their scabbards and were held on guard.
"Strike, strike," cried Gilbert madly,
"strike at head and heart; but before you have killed I will cry so loud that the King will see me and aid me." He threw himself upon the swords and beat them aside with his hands. None of the gentlemen were willing to take advantage of his blind frenzy else any one of them might have run him through. But when he had forced his way to the door hands were roughly laid upon him, and the end would have been fatal to him had not the door been thrown open and the boy King himself appeared.
Gilbert fell upon his knees before him with clasped hands, and moaning, in tremulous excitement, "O King, the King."
There was an instant cessation of hostilities, and swords were sheathed.
TO BE CONTINUED.

TEMPERANCE OF THE JEWS.—The Jewish Chronicle calls attention to the extraordinary fact that Jews never get drunk.
No one ever saw a Jew pulled up before a police court on a charge of drunkenness.
No one ever saw a Jew staggering home as the poor Irish do on a Saturday night.
In all countries the race of Abraham are remarkable for their sobriety. The writer of the article thinks that the habit of abstaining from various articles of food, enforced strictly by the Jews, may so far account for this, and also the more lively way in which they spend the Sunday.
