Doubly Blest §

Mrs. Remington, out of the kindness of her heart, immediately constituted herself the young lady's chaperon, and then threw around her her care and protection, for it seemed to forlorn for one young and beautiful to be obliged to Nome to a strange country alone.

Max thought her one of the handsomst and most brilliant women he had ver met; yet, at the same time, there was something about her which unaccountably repelled him, though he could not have defined what it was, nor would he have owned to the feeling, in so many words, even to himself; it was a subtle influence which he could neither understand nor explain.

Miss Laura Pomeroy, as she introduced herself, was a magnificent girl to look

Tell, queenly, with a superbly-proportioned figure, a wealth of purplish black hair, which she always wore coiled upon the top of her head, thus making her appear even more stately; with eyes to match her hair, and wonderfully expressive; and clear-cut, perfectly-molded leatures, that were all alive with keenest intelfigence and a complexion of olive. intelfigence, and a complexion of olive and rose, without a blemish, she was a person to attract the attention of everyone who saw her.

She had, apparently, been accustomed to good society and was well educated, with all her beauty and polish, Miss Pomeroy sometimes impressed one as not possessing a truly womanly nature; it was not often, but occasionally, to anyone versed in reading character, to anyone versed in reading character, there would come a suspicion that there had been passages in her life which would not bear unveiling.

From the first hour of their meeting she had been greatly attracted toward the handsome, chivalrous Max; indeed, he and his delicate, unwearied attention to his beautiful mother were the admiration of everyone, wherever they went. Consequently, Miss Pomeroy made herself useful and agreeable in every possible way to Mrs. Remington, shrewdly surmising that such a course would be surmising that such a course would be the surest way to ingratiate herself with this devoted son.

She adroitly discovered her likes and dislikes, anticipated her wants, read her favorite books, and chose subjects of conversation that were most agreeable this was, of course, very alluring to Max, and, in spite of the vague repul-sion of which he was at times conscious he gradually came to regard her as a delightful companion, and by the time they reached New York she seemed naturally to belong to them, and had grown to conduct herself almost with bearing of a daughter toward Mrs. Upon the arrival of the party in Chi-her own home until she could communicate with her uncle who, she said was not expecting her, a circumstance which her hostess thought somewhat

Did you not inform him that you were coming?" she asked, in surprise.
"No," Laura replied, coloring slightly.
"I wrote to him immediately after mamma died, asking him what I should do, but receiving no reply I imagined that my letter had miscarried. I was very lonely—I did not feel as if I could wait to write again, so I determined to come myself to seek him and ask him to let me make my home with him."

She had told her new friend that the name of her uncle was Joseph Trow-bridge, and that in writing to him she and her mother had simply addressed their letters to Chicago, Ill., U. S. A. They did not even know the street or their letters to Chicago, Ill., U. S. A. They did not even know the street or number of his place of business or his home. Laura said that he was a man without any family, for he had never married, and probably he boarded in some hotel; but she had hoped that he would now make a home and let her keep house for him. house for him.
They searched the directory for his address, but no such person as Joseph Trowbridge could be found; there were Johns and Edwards and Georges, and almost every other name but Joseph, and Miss Pomeroy professed herself greatly

She appeared at a loss to know what to do; she had "some money," she said—enough to last her for a year or more; but if she could not find her uncle within that time, she would be obliged to do in that time, she would be obliged to do something to support herself.

"What could you do, dear?" Mrs. Remington asked her one day, when they were alone and had been talking over her uncomfortable situation.

"I could teach, I suppose," Laura answered, with flushed cheeks and downcast eyes. "I have a good education. I can play the piano, too, fairly well, and, if the customs of your country are not opposed to such a method, I could earn a good deal as an accompanist at congood deal as an accompanist at condoing such things, though," with a quick indrawn sigh, "it would be exceedingly to me to figure conspicuously

"Well, do not worry about it," Mrs.
"Well, do not worry about it," her Remington responded, soothingly, her sympathies all aroused by this evident shrinking from public life; "we may yet succeed in finding Mr. Trowbridge, and there will be no need of your doing anything for your own support-I sincerely hope so.

Laura shrugged her shapely shoulders and made a grimace behind her fan at this effort of her hostess to comfort her. Nothing was further from her intention than to work for her own living, if she could manage to exist in any other way. "I infer from what you have said that your uncle is a man of wealth." Mrs. Remington resumed, after a thoughtful

"I have always supposed him to be; as I have told you, he was always very senerous with mamma, whose means, though she had something of her own, were rather limited," Laura replied, the color flushing her cheek again.

"Your father must have been quite a young man when he died," Mrs. Reming-

"No, he was a good deal older than mamma," Laura answered, shooting a swift, keen glance at her hostess, which, if Mrs. Remington had seen, might have puzzled her somewhat.

"And Mr. Trowbridge—have you any idea how old he is?" the lady asked.

"I think he must be somewhere about alter. He too was a good deal older. "I think he must be somewhere about sixty. He, too, was a good deal older than mamma; but I have never even seen his picture, and he is almost as much a stranger to me as if he were in no way connected with my family."
