incessantly.

Flora and I cowered together in the parlor, more and more frightened as the hours went by. Our house was a lone, country mansion, several miles from the county town, and we were quite alone, all the family, including even the servants, having gone to the annual fair, and intending to stay till morning. stay till morning.
"I never heard such strange sounds," I said. "Surely that was somebody on the story ju how."

I was covered with blushes. But what I was covered with blushes. But what could I do? I did what a great many women, under similar circumstances would have done—I burst into tears.

Cousin Sam soothed me, and kissed me and told me again and again how much he loved me. But he tells everybody, to this day, that I proposed to him, and not he to me.

"Surely that was somebody on the story ju now."

"Nonsense," cried Flora, looking around nervously, however.

"It was only two nights ago," I replied, "that Mr. Brown's house was robbed. They do say," and here my voice tell to a whisper, "that an organized gang of thieves is going round the country."

"Mercy!" cried Flora, turning deadly pale, "suppose they come here. What's to be done! Hadn't we better go over to cousin Bell's?"

"What! at this time of night? Nothing would tempt me."

"This is a punishment for refusing cousin "This is a punishment for refusing cousin Sam," said Flora. "If you had only behaved rationally, we would have had one of the servants from Elmwood to stay with us. But I suppose Cousin Bell is so angry at the way in which you have treated her son that she will never speak to us again."

I had no reply to make. I already, in my heart, regretted the coquetry which had made me refuse Cousin Sam, but was too proud to admit it to anybody else but my self.

To turn the conversation, and to endeavor. This is a punishment for refusing cousin. Sam, but was too proud to admit it to anybody else but my self.
