EDITORIAL NOTES.

The modern newspaper is a faithful reflection of modern society. There are papers to supply every want of the nineteenth century life. Each department of science and invention, has its own particular journal. The mechanic, the artisan, even the day laborer, (not to speak of the Knight of Labor) has a periodical devoted to his interests. The hurried business man has his condensed accounts of the day's happenings, while his wife has her magazines and journals of art and fashion. In accordance with this part of the age it has for some time been the custom for schools to present their claims to public notice in this form. We of the Hamilton College are following this established custom in thus laying before our friends and patrons a resume of our student and social life. We hope that this edition will be met with favor and encouragement from all the friends of the College. We know that journalism is not generally considered woman's forte, although she is
