the hotel, reaction set in, and her great grief showed how devotedly she loved the man whom she insulted. She flung her-self upon the bed and cried as if her heart were broken.

"Oh, Blanche!" she exclaimed aloud be-caused the change. In punishing him for his perfidy to her cousin Blanche she had sacrificed herself. She could never love another man as she had loved him.

As she was one day walking on the beach with her cousin Blanche they suddenly came upon Brice Ventnor. He was alone and stood still for a minute, the meeting and stood still for a limite, the meeting was so unexpected to him. The board walk was so high and narrow just there, and the ladies could not get away.

He lifted his bat, looked mournfully and reproachfully at Miriam, as if half inclined reproachtuly at Miriam, as it had inclined to speak, then sprang from the walk and strode toward the nearest pavilion.

Miriam recognized him and was touched at the look he had bestowed upon her.

"Who was that superb looking gentleman?" asked her cousin Blanche. "Did he bow to you or to me?"

"Oh!" cried Miriam, catching her breath, one hand unconsciously clinched. "Is he not the man who trified with you?"

"Brice Ventnor?" exclaimed Blanche.

"Why, no, child."

The blood receded from Miriam's lins, and The blood receded from Miriam's lips, and a low moan escaped from them. She grew so weak for a little while that she was forced to lean heavily upon Blanche, who conducted her to one of the rustic benches, She fanned her, rubbed her hands and

That he did not belong to the ship was rink he the the evident enough, for he was not in uniform, but in plain clothes, and his fair complexion and light hair contrasted so markedly with the swarthy faces and black beards of with the swarthy faces and black beards of the crew as to show at the first glance that he was no countryman of theirs.

He might of course be a passenger, and such indeed he was, but a passenger of a somewhat peculiar kind—viz, a prisoner. An American by birth, he had served for some time in the United States navy, and then seeing no chance of active service; had gone south to take part as a volunteer in one of the countless wars that were always going on in South America, in the course of which his ship and himself after a long and desperate combat had been taken by the enemy.

Such being the case, it might have seem—

The bathers on the beach had clasped hands to breast an inrolling wave; the band was playing on the breezy porches of the hotel, grand equipages whirled over the glittering sands; a ship in full sail was visible in the channel; the sun was sinking into the water line of the horizon.

"Miriam," Brice Ventnor said, his voice husky, his manner agitated, "I have the right to ask your reason for this rejection."

He was locking at her with so much directness that she did not care to have her comfortable.

But for all this kindness they were destined to be repaid in a very unexpected manner.
The frigate, having received not a few severe injuries in the recent fight, was making for Carthagena—the nearest Colombian port—in order to refit, and all went well till they were within a short distance of the coast, when the weather, which had hitherto been beautifully fine, suddenly because their and have all properties and the research their and have all provinces their and have all their and have all hitherto been beautifully fine, suddenly beteme thick and hazy, culminating at length in one of those formidable sea fogs which so often roll in from the north Atlantic when no one expects them, literally turning day into night.

The Colombian captain, though familiar with these waters from his childhood, was now "at sea" in every sense of the words, and brave as he was began to feel uncomfortable. He knew that he could not be far from the mouth of the Carthagena harbor, and he remembered only too well the dangerous coral reefs which made it one of the most perilous spots in all South America. most perilous spots in all South America.

Moreover, in waters which literally swarmed with coasting vessels of all sizes, the risk of a fatal collision stared them in the face every moment, and in such weather, when no one could see half a cable's ngth ahead, what could they do to avoid The officers were all on deck the captain himself included—and with them was the American prisoner, whose thorough faval training enabled him to appreciate the fair extent of the danger as keenly at any man

All were straining their eyes and ears to the utmost for any sign of an approaching vessel, when all at once the Yankee officer's quick sight described, looming shostlike through the spectral dimness that hemmed them in, the shadowy outline of a huge ship, half as large again as their own, which seemed to be bearing right down upon them.

His warning shout called the attention of his companions to this alarming appari-tion, which was already close aboard of Then the officer of the watch, a young and comparatively inexperienced man, unnerved by this sudden and terrific peril, lost his head and called out wildly to the man at the wheel:

man at the wheel:
"Port your helm!"
But the captive American, with his Yankee quickness and long nautical experience, saw in a moment that this order, if obeyed, must inevitably bring the two vessels into collision. Quick as lightning he sprang forward and shouted in Spanish to the steersman with the full strength of his powerful voice:

the steersman with the full strength of his powerful voice:
"Starboard your helm! Starboard!"
The second order came just in time to counteract the first. Round flew the wheel, and the frigate, "paying off" barely in time, passed so close to the strange vessel that, as Jack's favorite saying would phrase it, "you might have shied a biscuit aboard." In another instant the stranger had vanished like a dream. ished like a dream. "By St. Jago!" muttered the sailors to each other. "That official Americano" (American officer) "has been a lucky we'r (American officer) "has been a lucky pris-oner for us, for if it hadn't been for him we should have gone straight to the bottom ship and all." About an hour later the fog "lifted," and the anxious captain beheld to his no small relief the familiar entrance of Carthagena relief the familiar entrance of Carthagena harbor only a few miles off on the port bow, with its grim old fortress scowling above it. And when they had worked their way in through the perilous channel and were safe at anchor in the sheltered road-stead the young Colombian lieutenant went straight up to the spot where the American prisoner was standing and held out his hand.

"Senor," said he, with stately Spanish courtesy, "your skill and presence of mind have saved all our lives and our ship as well, for, had you not had the boldness to contradict the order which I gave, I and all my companions would have been lost. In their names and my own I beg to thank you for what you have done, and I trust you will permit me to have the honor of presenting you with this slight token of my gratitude."

He drew a costly emerald ring from his American, who accepted with a courteous bow, and in after years when the war was over and the two brave men met as friends the Colombian saw his gift still upon the northern officer's finger, where indeed it re-mained so long as the latter was alive.—
