MOONDYNE. THE GOLD MINE OF THE VASSE.

Into the hands of Mr. Haggett had be ven the spiritual welfare of all the invicts in Millbank, of every creed— Christian, Turk, and Jew.

It was a heavy responsibility; but Mr
Haggett felt himself equal to the task.

It would be wrong to lay blame for the choice of such teacher on any particu-ar creed. He had been selected and appointed by Sir Joshua Hobb, whos ecial views of religious influence he was carry out. Mr Haggett was a tall man with a highly respectable air. He had side whiskers, brushed out till they stood from his lank cheeks like paint brushes; nd he wore a long square-cut brow oat. He had an air of formal super sonorous. If he only said "Good-morn ing," he said it with a patronizing smile as if conscious of a superior mora

One would have known him in the street as a man of immense religious weight and godly assumption, by the very compression of his lips. These were his strong features, even more forcible than the rigid respectibility of his whiskers, or the grave sanctity of his voice. His lips were not exactly coarse or thick; they were large, even to bagginess. His mouth was wide and his teeth were long; but there was enough left to fold afterwards into consciously pious lines around the mouth.

When Mr. Haggett was praying, he losed his eyes, and in a solemnly-sonor ous key began a personal interview with the Almighty. While he was informing God, with many deep "Thou knowests, his lips were in full play; every reef wa shaken out, so to speak. But wher Mr. Haggett was instructing a prisoner he moved only the smallest portion of labial tissue that could serve to impress the unfortunate with his own unworthing ess and Mr. Haggett's exalted virtue and importance.

Mr. Haggett visited the cells for to hours every day, taking regular rounds, and prayed with and instructed the prisoners. He never sympathized with them, nor pretended to, and, of course, he never had their confidence—except the sham confidence and contrition come second-timers, who wanted a recon mendation for a pardon.

There was another official who made regular rounds, with about the same intervals of time as Mr. Haggett. This was the searcher and fumigator—a warder who searched the cells for concealed im-plements, and fumigated with some chemical the crevices and joints, to keep them wholesomely clean. When a prisoner had a vasit from the searcher and fumigator, he knew that Mr. Hargett would be around soon. The sense of duty in the two officials was very much alike under the surface and it would have saved expense and time had Mr. Haggett carried, besides his Bible, the little bellows and probe of the migator-if he had been, in fact, the

Mr. Haggett had observed, with hor ror, the visits of the Popish nun to the cell of a prisoner whom he knew to be a Protestant. Though he never had had never had prayed with her for five ye he now deemed her one of those specially confided to his care. He was shocked to the centre when first he saw the whitecapped nun sitting in the cell, with a rosary in her hands.

Mr. Haggett would have complained at once, but he did not like the governor.

at once, but he did not like the governor. He had been insulted, he felt he had, by the governor, who never met him but he asked the same impertinent question: "Well, Mr. Haggett, got your regular commission in the ministry yet?"

Mr. Haggett was in hopes of becoming, some day, a regular minister of the Established Church. He was "studying for it," he said; and his long experience in the prison would tell in his favor. But the prison would tell in his favor. Bu the prison would tell in his favor. But the years had flown, and he had not secured the reverend title he so ardently coveted. The Lords Bishops were not favorably impressed by Mr. Haggett's ac-quirements or qualities. The daily presence of the nun in one of his cells goaded him to desperation. He styped one day at the door of Num-ber Four, and, in his deepest chesttones. Undertaker ber Four, and, in his deepest chesttones, with a smile that drew heavily, on the labial reefs, addressed the Sister:—

"Is this prisoner a Rom—ah—one of cours persuage, washes." Court House

"Is this prisone: a Rom—ah—one of your persuasion, madam?"

"No, sir," said the little Sister, with a kind smile at Alice; "I wish she were."

"Hah!—Why, madam, do you visit a prisoner who is not of your persuasion?"

"Because no one else visited her," said Sister Cecilia, looking at Mr. Haggett with rather a startled arr; "and she needed some one." QUEEN Hotel!

"Madame, I wish to pray with this prisoner this morning, and ah—ah—I will thank you to leave this cell." Seeds! Seeds! The work dropped from Alige's hands, and a wild look came into her eyes. First, she stared at Mr. Haggett, as if she did not understand. From his uninviting face, now flushed somewhat, and working as if the godly man were in a passion, she turned, with a mute appeal to Sister Cecilia. FEED & FERTILIZERS.
