A Victory Won by the French
An indication, and not the first, that the French are either more skilful or more fortunate than their neighbors as inventors of names for new things is to be found in the word "avion," recently manufactured and now in common use by them for application to the machine which we and other peoples are still calling—when we have time—by the almost intolerably awkward name of "aeroplane."

The French name is exactly right It pleases both the eye and the earlit is perfect in construction, and it carries the essential, all-important and only distinctive idea of birdike flight—a significance that is wholly lacking from "aeroplane." There are probably a dozen. possibly a score, of other devices that cre "aeroplanes" just as much as is the one we so denominate. Among them are windmills, kites, weather vanes and sails.

Another objection to "aeroplane" is that it demands an accent so far from its end that our linguistic in stinct, or sense of verbal rightness and propriety, is offended by the request, and most of us linsist on stressing the antepennit and letting it go at that, "Avion" has no such faults, and it is as good English as French, now that it has been revealed to us.

But it is penhaps too late, alas! for us to change, and the chances are that we shall continue, though not giadly, to suffer "aeroplane." just as we do the even worse word. "The Hod is Doomed.
