The chapel is usually cool, but next Thursday its interior will be about as roomy and poorly ventilated as a sarding box. It is not often that so much that is eminent is put into so small a space.

Ablaze With Splendor. The chapel on the wedding day will be in a blaze of glory from the splender of the uniforms and decorations, and hardly a person will be there who has not some claim to fame. Already a good many royal fignesses have arrived, and each day brings additions. Of course all are on dress parade and their sulter as well. Thus ondon's streets are made lively with pro-Cossions daily.

and what with leves, receptions and dinners, the atreets each afternoon are adorned with most interesting and most dazzing bumsa beings dressed in propor-tion to their rank.

The Expectant Bride. Encouraged by the example of the Princess May—in getting together a vast and gorgeous tronsseau, every woman who is anybody at all has been getting new gowns and new hats.

A new review gives an elaborate analysis of Princess May's character, spread thinly over a good many pages, making her a Sandford-and-Merton sort of person, instead of the good-humored, lively, very human young woman she realiy is. The artific tiescribes her as the personification of order, and goes into harrowing details about next rows of carefully-sharpened pencils and careful subdivisions of the day that would have put to shame even prosvold Alfred the Good with his ringed candle and so much to be done for each ring.

Princess May really has had an access of dignity of late that is almost solemnity, but the reason for it is not in her nature nor yet in the weight of responsibility, but in the reason for it is not in her nature nor yet in the weight of responsibility, but in the reason for it is not in her nature nor yet in the weight of responsibility, but in the effect of the death of her present finance's elder brother and in the foreboding and fears with which the whole royal family are filled. It is said that Princess May has an impression that she is anything but a mascot, and that some further misfortune is impanding.

Descarating the Holy Land.

The fact is that never did a bridegroom look was happy. Exertions of preparation for the wedding have exhausted him completely. His skin is pale and unhealthy and his cheeks are hollow, while his manner is listless and depressed. Those who have met him within a few months do not try to conceal their conviction that he will not live long and will never mount the throne of England. His appearance accounts for the melancholy look which forced smile cannot drive from the sweet face of Princess May. umor was false, but equally false is the
