

Opponents of an elected Senate argue that such an institution is outside Canadian expertise and that the effort of introducing it are negligible. They believe that the Australian experience, far from supporting the option of a bicameral system, has revealed serious problems.

Finally, they argue that it is a basic principle of the common law system that the executive branch of government should be responsible to the elected representatives of the people. The House of Commons is the only institution that can be held responsible for the actions of the executive branch.
