Farmer's Calendar.—It ought to be deeply impressed on the mind of every youth that respectability is attached to no one profession ; no station can confer it, and no employment, however humble, can deprive a man of it, if the duties of that station be uprightly and virtuously performed.— Merit in the man renders his station respectable ; without intelligence and virtue, the man of property, the physician, the lawyer, or a man of any other station, claims no respect ; and with it, the young mechanic, or the farmer, is truly respectable, and respected by all who know him. Let young men be employed in the various mechanic trades, but use their leisure time for improving their minds ; let them, while so doing, shun vice, and abhor the arts of those who would fill them with discontent, poison their principles, and hurry them on to rashness and folly, and they will secure respectability. Sprinkle brine on your coarse fodder, and give it
