The complaints of the steward beat the men unmercifully with belaying pins, besides setting the captain's dog on them. This dog, according to the crew, is a large, ferocious Russian hound, trained especially to ter-rorize the men on board the ship. The captain, when summoned to a preliminary examination by the consul, laughed and said: "I know nothing about the charges. There was no trouble on board the ship." He admitted owning the dog, but refused to talk further. The case will come up for a hearing again in consul's office, when the crew and all the officers will be asked to testify. A statement written by a member of the crew and signed by all the men recites that sailors were beaten until covered with blood and seriously bitten by the dog. On the pasasge from Rio de Janeiro, the port whence she sailed from Cibu, Phillippine islands, and thence to Boston, the boatswain, who had been laid up for four or five weeks with fever, was buried at sea, although what some of the crew thought were signs of life were apparent.
