Cline's private office had a new feature. There was an instrument under the window with a black tin roof over it, and a little sailor hat, with a blue ribbon on it, hung on the bronze peg opposite the door.

He was signing checks. It was covery and said: Fsnaw, don't mention it my child. I am about as kind as the average business man—no more, no less. We've got one of the most serious moments of his life. He looked up and saw the sailor hat on the brown hair.
