A Mutirous Negro Waterman Tnrows a Captain Overboard and Then NEW DRESS GOODS. Drowns Himself. PORTSMOUTH, April 11. On Thursday night the freight barge GREY AND WHITE COTTONS Neuse, loaded with fish and shingles, under the command of Capt. David Crocker, and belonging to the Pioneer Transpor tation Company, of this city, lett Edenton, N. C., for Norfolk, in tow of the Canadian Tweeds steam tug Ludlow, a hawser of about seventy yards connecting the two vessels. The right was dark and very rough, and the progress across the Albemarie Sound was slow and difficult. Previous to salling Captain Crocker had had some difficulty with one of his negro hands, named Andrew Whitehurst, and the negro at once began to nurse such a dreadful animosity towards the Captain that he went to Mrs. Crocker, who sailed with her husband and was on deck at the time, while the Captain was below, and, accosting her angrily, remarked:

Shortly afterwards Mrs. Crocker hear her husband at words with Whitehurst and heard his voice singing out very loud, several times, as she thought to those on board the tug Ludlow. A short time after this, while Mrs. Crocker was listening and patiently waiting the return of her husband, she heard Whitehurst telone of the negro crew, who came aft, that the captain had just fallen overboard. She immediately flew up the cabin ladder and on deck and charged Whitehurst with having thrown Captain whitehurst with having thrown Captali Crocker overboard. Whitehurst stouth denied having committed the murder, and insisted that the Captain fell overboard

Mrs. Crocker- became very violently affected and alarmed and screamed for help to the people on the tug, but the winds were roaring to such an extent that her cries could not be heard the length of the barge. Frightened at the probability of personal violence from Whitehurt, she appealed to the negro standing near for protection. He promptly pledged her that she should receive his protection. She continued to charge Whitehurst with murdering her husband, and he would as persistently d, and he would as persistently husband, and he would as persistently deny the accusation.

Suddeuly Whitehurst let go the wheel, and, going torward, stripped off his coat, and was seen by all the hands on deck to suddenly plunge overboard into the seething waters of Albermarle Sound. Remorse had evidently overcome the murderous negro, and he sought in the grave of a suicide to wipe out the miscry that overwhelmed him.

The whole transaction happened off the mouth of Perquimon's River, where the Sound is eight or nine miles wide.
