LIFE'S EPITOME.

By William Dudley Mabry.

The day is young. The silver sheen of night
Has vanished in the golden flood of morn.
The dew yet lingers pendent in the light,
And bright the fields with daisies newly born.

I stand beneath the glow of early dawn.
Inviting tasks await my willing hands,
With ardent hopes and youthful arms of brawn,
I hasten forth to meet the day's demand.

The day wears on—the morning glamor fades,
The flowers droop beneath the noontide sun.
The dust of toil pulsing air pervades,
While swift the passing hours their courses run.

The day is old, and I with grief confess
My work is incomplete. Across my way
An adverse wind hath swept, and in distress
I leave my task to wait another day.

The day is done. The shadows lengthen—
A somber sign of swift approaching night.
From out the azure depth appears a star
As low the sinking sun is lost.
