Country Folk Keep the Headstones

Bright Through Their Own Labor.

The well ordered city cemetery offers sharp contrast to the cemetery of the countryside-the one laid out regularly by a landscape architect and kept continually spruced up by the labor of many gardeners; the other a wilderness usually, where trees and briers and vines grow as they will.

So when a man whose early days were spent in the country views Greenwood or Woodlawn or other less retentious cemeteries his mind goes pack to the graveyard he knew. It ay, and still lies, on a hillside where the sun came oftenest; a wall of stones oiled unevenly surround it; within the aths ran crookedly this way and hat, bordered by wild rose and honey uckle and the weeping willow, scat-ered in nature's splendid disorder. But he remembers that most of the tombstones gleamed just or white in the sunlight as do the more elaborate tombstones he is contemplating. Of course in the city the men attached to the cemeteries see that the tomb-to the cemeter's see that the comostones are kept clean.

How was it in the country? Surely the aged sexton who dug the graves didn't take care of them after the last words of the burial service had been seid.

ed after its own burial plot, not in naphazard fashion but as a matter of coutine. There wasn't much sentioutine. There wasn't much senti-nent in the performance; it was part the year's work.

A day in the spring he recollects, as set apart for this duty. It you yed at a distance it was quite an ived at a distance it was quite an indertaking. The wagon was loaded up with gar-The wagon was loaded up with gardening tools and scrubbing brushes and soap and a big wash boiler. At the house nearest, the cemetery you called and got this boiler filled with hot water. He recalls that the wagon pursued an uneven course through the burying ground.

The first thing was to give each ourying ground.

The first thing was to give each marble headstone a thorough scrubbing with soap and water. Then a little rough gardening was done, not lough to give the graves a trim ap-enough to give the graves a trim appearance, but sufficient to mark each from its neighbor's.

It was the custom of all the countryside to keep the headstones bright, and many persons could be seen working energetically with scrubbing brushes on any early spring day. But some graves were neglected, he recalls; all the family had died or moved away and the graves they deserted were fast being covered from sight in rlot of brier and tangled grass.

It must be that the graves of his ancestors were that way now, for all his kin not dead had found homes elsewhere on the earth. These lines from Longfellow's "Morituri Salutamus" come to his mind:
Each at some well remembered grave will kneel
And from the inscription wipe the weeds and moss.
For every heart best knoweth its own loss:
And he resolves as he comes out pearance, but sufficient to mark each loss:

And he resolves as he comes out of his day dreaming that he will go back some day and see that the headstones are polished bright sgain. But he never does.—N. Y. Sun.

services in any capacity were two Americans, Miss Bristow and Miss Logan, who, together with Mme. Lademburg, an Austrian, and Mme. Pictet, a French woman, were the only women equestrians in the show. This lack of feminine riders promised at first to make the performance rather too much of an exhibition of gentlemen's high school riding, so two young officers of a cavalry regiment stationed in Rome consented to make up as ballet dancers, and with their tarlatan skirts pirouetted around the ring on bareback, while a slender youth, Signor Serventi, sporting the name of "Miss Hervent, the lady shot from the far west," was very clever with the rifle and only a trifle too busom to be quite winning.

Everything was done to give a professional air to the show. The attendants, all members of the Roman nobility, filed out at the beginning of the performance dressed in red liveries trimmed with cald great success, if box receipts mean anything, as the treasurer handed over $6,000 to the directors.

Baron Morpurgo, Marquis Calabrini, master of the King's horse, and Donna Maria Mazzoleni were the chief organizers. When the performance was first spoken of many of the Italians were opposed to the idea that noble ladies; should expose themiselves in the ring even for charity, and in fact the only ladies who would join the troupe were foreigners, probably owing to the fact that the best equestriennes in Roman society are not Romans, but Americans, French women and Austrians.

who were dressed in rich Spanish coswho were dressed in rich spanish cos-tumes; vaultings on horsebasek by Prince Doria and Count Santa Barbara, and the usual high class jumping. The names of the performers might figure as a list of the very smartest of Roman society, as not only the leading sportsmen took part in the show, but artists and musicians co-operated as well. Signor ifto Ricrodi, the well known musical publisher, took the humble part of an attendant sporting a red and gold livery.

and gold livery. Daffodils.

The lovely spot is known to tradition where Wordsworth saw his daffodils where Wordsworth saw his daffodils dancing by the lake; and though we have no such clue to the spot where Shakespeare saw them "take the winds of March with beauty," we can well pic-ture it on one of his comely Warwick-shire hillsides, where the dulness of the midland landscapes begins to sink into the charm of the west.—London Times.

A cocoanut was brought to me just as picked up in a Colombo garden, with the head of a big rat fixed into the nut, nearly full size, when the nut tumbled and before the rat could withdraw it was crushed to death between the nut and the ground.—Ceylon Observer.
