Coincidences.

By RUTH CAMERON.

RUTH CAMERON

The other night in a newspaper office part of the name of the senior member of a firm whose advertisement that paper carries daily, fell from the press. It was then between one and two in the morning. The next day the news came to the office that early that morning the senior member of the firm had died.

A newspaper friend of mine who was night editor in that office told me that story the other day.

What do you think of it?

That it is only a coincidence? Yes, so do I—that is in the part of me that insists on looking at things sensibly. But in spite of the wet blanketing of common sense, don't you just love coincidences? Don't you love to have them happen to you, to tell of them, and to hear about them.

Everyone Loves A Coincidence.

I confess I do. And I think almost everyone does, for let such a story as that of the night editor be related in any company and immediately everyone is sure of its absolute authenticity (no aspersions on the veracity of the authorship intended, but second-hand stories are never quite so unimpeachable as the first-hand variety).

The Night The Fire Chief Died.

The author told of the death of a man who had been fire chief of his city for many years. The night he died (the very moment, the author-man thinks, but is not sure—second-hand you see) something went wrong in the wire system and all the fire-bells began to ring out the death of their chief.

The morning my grandfather lay dying we heard a crash in the parlor and rushed down from his bedroom to see what had happened. On the floor lay the picture of my grandfather which had hung in twin state beside grandmother's for nigh on forty years. Grandfather died that afternoon.

Of course a coincidence is nothing but a coincidence—according to Daniel Webster, two contemporaneous happenings, and according to common usage, two contemporaneous happenings between which there appears to be some strange and miraculous relationship.

Such dramatic happenings are merely a result of the working out of the law of permutation and combination. Pictures fall and people die every day. Once in a great number of times the picture of some person is due to fall on the day he dies. When that happens it is not a sign or a warning, merely a coincidence.

And Yet, In Spite Of Common Sense.

That's common sense. And yet in spite of all it has to say, there is something about these strange happenings with their delicious suggestion of the miraculous, their thrilling hints at hidden forces that plagues the cosmic curiosity in most of us.

We know they are only coincidences, but we almost wish we didn't.

And now if this chat moves you to contribute your favourite coincidence, be sure it will be welcomed and passed along. We don't have to believe in the miraculous quality of coincidences to like them, any more than we have to really believe in ghosts to enjoy a ghost story.

How to Protect the Skin.

To keep the skin delicate and transparent, as to show its natural coloring, protect it by using Nyal's Face Cream.

Before going out wash with Face Cream Soap, then rub the Cream well into the pores, and you can spend a day out of doors without the slightest injury to the skin.

For a few days, with every 25c. crock of Nyal's Face Cream sold, we will give a trial size cake of Nyal's Face Cream Soap.

Your Boys and Girls.

It has often been declared that the sound of running water has the effect of lulling one to sleep, but in India the mothers go much further than this and make their babies sleep by letting a small stream of water flow directly on their little heads.

Such means seem almost incredible, and one might think colds and other ailments would result that would kill the babies, but apparently this novel liquid lullaby has no harmful effects upon the native infants, and they lie sleeping for hours with a stream of water flowing directly upon the top of their heads.

This is done by the native mothers in the vicinity of Simla. There the women do a great deal of field work and must leave their babies alone. Few of the women can afford caretakers, and so they resort to what they consider the best thing.

McGuire's, Dandykake.

O, wifey dear, and did you hear, the news that's on the go,
McGuire's Bread contains a tag, ten dollars worth you know,
The one who strikes the lucky loaf, they'll jump with joy "my boys."
And "heel it" to McGuire's, to get the promised prize.

McGuire's Bread "it can't be beat," 'tis worth its weight in gold,
In every home in St. John's, it is prized by young and old,
And now there is his Dandykake, a dandy 'tis no doubt,
It will melt with sugar icing, just like butter in your mouth.

So, wifey, buy McGuire's loaf, good weight I do declare,
Maybe a tag in one of them we may locate my dear;
If I were you I would eschew your home-made bread to bake
Until we find a prize-tag in McGuire's Dandykake.
