

A Bank Account For Your Wife

More and more, are the wives of today running their homes on a business basis—systematically and efficiently.

Many wives have a monthly allowance for household expenses. This, they deposit in a Savings Account in The Merchants Bank—settle bills by cheque—and thus have an accurate record of bills paid.

Such a business-like method also gives a woman the feeling of happy independence in having a bank account of her own.

you," he says. "Do you smoke?" The vicar pleads guilty. "I'll take the ladies to the drawing room and come back to you."

"Oh, don't trouble; I'll take them, sir," says Bobby; and with mock politeness he offers an arm to each of them.

"I say!" he exclaims, almost before Levondale has closed the door after them, "did you ever see or hear anyone like him? Now that's what I call a man—a man! He's just splendid, eh, Ida?"

"You need not shout your opinion at the top of your voice. Lord Levondale is quite vain enough already," she retorts, crossing the drawing-room and dropping into the luxurious lounge near the fire.

"Vain!" retorts Bobby, indignantly. "There isn't an ounce of vanity in him. You could tell that by the way he told the story of his mare. By George he's a cool one! I'd like to have seen that."

"I dare say you would. So should I," says Ida, scornfully. "So I would the mountains in the moon."

Bobby eyes her wrathfully. "Do you mean to say you don't believe that?" she says, defiantly, but with a droop of her eyes.

"My dear Ida," says Cecilia, gently, "isn't that rather an uncharitable assertion?"

"Well, if it's true it's the shameful boast of having killed a man," she retorts, sharply.

"I don't think Lord Levondale was in the slightest degree boastful," says Cecilia, judiciously. "He told the story rather reluctantly and simply for our amusement."

"Nice amusement! A page out of the 'Newgate Calendar' or the 'Adventures of Baron Munchausen!'" says Ida but with her eyes turned to the fire.

"Well of all the ungrateful young idiots I ever met with," exclaims Bobby, thoroughly exasperated, "I think you're the worst. Here's a man gone out of his way to give you a good dinner and exerted himself to amuse you in—every possible way, and you've nothing but abuse for him. What's the matter with you? You've been like a bear with a sore head."

"Bobby, Bobby!" remonstrates Cecilia.

"Well, it's the truth. Now wasn't she? I don't think she has said a civil word to Lord Levondale all the evening. I don't like to see a man treated like that by a bit of a girl. I've got a fellow-feeling."

"Hah! Hah!" laughs Ida; but the lovely face is getting crimson.

"I say it's beastly bad form," says Bobby. "What has he done, that you should treat him like this? If it's only temper you ought to be sent right off to bed—or to a lunatic asylum. But what is the matter? Nobody could help liking him—nobody."

"Then I'm somebody," retorts Ida, her eyes flashing, "for I dislike him."

The door opens as she makes this assertion, and the vicar and the earl enter. Her voice is clear at that moment—it was like a bell at that moment—and Levondale could not have failed to hear her.

She turns her eyes from Bobby's wrathful face to the earl's with a gleam of defiance in them; but he shows no sign of the discomfort and embarrassment which he ought to feel.

Instead, he goes straight up to her and holds his hands to the blaze. Ida looks at them, and sees that they are long, thin, but strong hands. She notices something else for the first time, that evening; there is a long scar across the back of the left. She wonders what history is connected with that. She sees that there is no ring on his finger, and as her eyes wander reluctantly upward she observes that the stud at his shirt-front is of plain mother-of-pearl, worth a shilling at the most. As her eyes reach his face, she is impressed by its expression. It is the same as that which he wore when he sat beside her on the boat, holding the tray—listless and infinitely weary. It is quite evident that, with his back to the company, he has for a moment forgotten them, and forgotten to be entertaining.

But suddenly he comes back from the clouds—or the black pit of past memories—and looks at her. His eyes rest upon her now studiously averted face with a strange wistfulness and sadness, then he says:

"Our cigarettes were devoured in our anxiety to get back to you, Miss Ida. I was hoping that you would give us some music."

She does not raise her head. "Cecilia sings and plays," she said curtly.

FEARLESS AND HONEST

A Scotch lad arrived at Euston, the brightest, yet the loneliest passenger by the London and Northwestern Company's express. He was barely fourteen, had not a friend in London and only a sovereign in his pocket.

"Well, Sandy," said a fellow passenger, who had befriended him during the journey from Glasgow, "don't you wish now that you were safe with your mother in Scotland?"

"No," said the boy; "I promised when I left that I would be fearless and honest. I have her fortune to make as well as my own and I must have good courage."

"Well, laddie, what can you do?" asked a kind voice behind him.

"I can be loyal and true to anybody who will give me something to do," was the quick response.

A well-known lawyer whose experience with applicants for clerkships in his office had been unfavorable, was passing at the moment.

Sandy's fearless face caught his eye. The honest, manly ring in Sandy's voice touched his faithful Scotch heart.

"Tell me your story," he said kindly.

It was soon told. Sandy's mother had been left a widow, with little money and a child to bring up. She had worked for him as long as she could, but when her health failed she had bought his ticket for London, and had given him what little money she could spare.

"Go and make your fortune," she said. "Be fearless and honest, and don't forget your mother, who cannot work for you any longer."

Having heard this story, the lawyer engaged Sandy as an office boy.

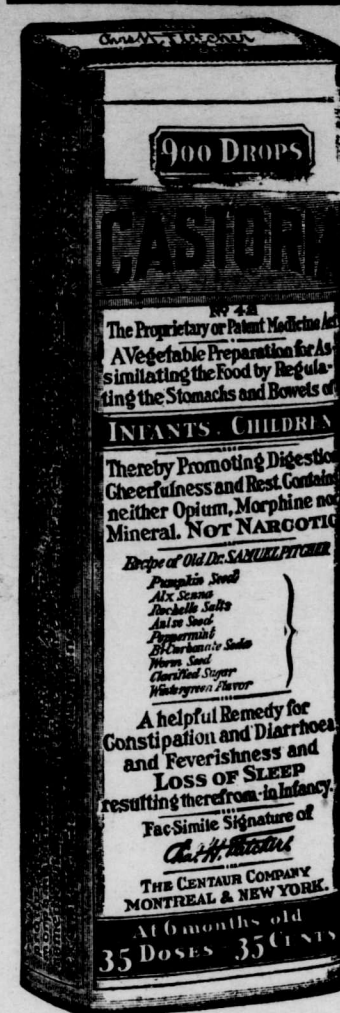

"I will give you a chance," he said, "to show what there is in you. Write to your mother to-day that you have found a friend who will stand by you as long as you are fearless and honest."

Sandy became a favorite at once in the office. Many of the clients who entered the office paused to have a word with him.

He attended evening classes, and became an expert penman and accountant. He was rapidly promoted until he became his patron's confidential clerk.

After sharing his earnings with his mother he went to Scotland and brought her back with him.

By and by he studied law, and when he began to practice at the bar his fearlessness commanded respect, and his honesty inspired confidence. Jurors liked to hear him speak; they instinctively trusted him.
