et from her he told it to l it to her d not keep ozen people o the ...and was again d Jo Porhe sentries gifts, the re. Their ging to the e Seigneur for honrs night, as was his came to and day." vith vain been dearn from the Seieat pride vard had hich had rtance so elf with Fortune repidity, and his turesque ses, and ollars he ec, four ad only

reshness

of the horses which his dramatic foresight had pro-

The leader of these four pursuers was Billy Wantage, who had come to know of the curions action of the Seignenr of Chandière from an intimate friend, a clerk in the bank. Billy's fortunes were now in a bad way, and, in desperate straits for money, he had planned this bold attempt at the highwayman's art wir tree gamblers, to whom he owed money, and a certai. :. rious horse-trader of whom he had made a companion of late. Having escaped punishment for a crime once before, through Charley's supposed death, the immunity nerved him to this later and more dangerous enterprise. The fonr rode as hard as their horses would permit, but M. Dauphin and his companion kept always an hour or more ahead, and, from the high hills overlooking the village, Billy and his friends saw the two enter it safely in the light of evening.

His three friends urged Billy to tnrn back, since they were ont of provisions and had no shelter. It was unwise to go to a tavern or a farmer's house, where they mnst certainly be suspected. Billy, however, determined to make an effort to find the banking-place of the money, and refnsed to turn back without a trial. He therefore proposed that they should separate, going different directions, secure accommodation for the night, rest the following day, and meet the next night at a point indicated.

This was agreed upon, and they separated.

When the four met again, Billy had nothing to communicate, as he had been taken ill during the night before, and had been nnable to go secretly into Chaudière village. They separated once more. When they met the next night Billy was accompanied by an old confederate. As he was entering Chaudière the previous evening, he had met John Brown, with his painted wagon and a new mottled horse. John Brown had news of importance to give; for, in the stable-yard of the village tavern, he had heard one habitant confide to another that the money for the new church was kept in the safe of the tailor-shop. John Brown was as ready to share in Billy's second