some twenty-five years ago, his entire worldly possessions could not have satisfied a Welsh-man's expectations. He had a little room adjoining the office of the old Courier—on a first floor 'down the chimney.' In that attic resort he spent his days, and some of his nights, working up his medicine and planning a campaign. First a demijohn was used in compounding, and then a barrel, and so on. Little money, little credit, for who will lend on an enthusiast's dreams? We knew his conflicts well, and many was the time when it seemed the end of the world had come, and no mistake. Nothing could be done without advertising, and advertising bills had to be paid.
To describe the anxiety and heartache, and sometimes actual despair, which attended his labors, might add to the pathos of our narrative, but it could in no wise add to its truth. But pluck prevailed. In a few years he set up a drug store on Shetucket street. In a year or two after, so successful had his Cholagogue become, he removed to Commerce street and established one of the largest wholesale drug and chemical houses in Connecticut. Next he purchased the buildings adjoining, and enlarged again. Then he dipped into other real estate operations, and made money every time. Afterward he bought one of the most splendid private residences in the city, in which he yet lives. And so on from that day to the present. His income from store and stocks —bank and government and railroad—is set down at a hundred thousand a year, while Cholagogue brings in as much more. He said, God willing, I'll win. And the will did it.
