The America was sailing almost due east, when Mr. McCoy decided to anthor. From the record made by the erman balloon Pommern, it is clear that the America had no chance to win, but it kept on, for there was not and enough to the east for it to cover the difference had it gone on to a point hear the Atlantic ocean.

Occupants of the America stood the rip well, although they felt the cold while crossing the Allegheny and Blue Ridge mountains and suffered somewhat from the need of sleep. The cold prevented sleep and they were compelled to remain awake practically the whole time they were in the air. Cap-ain Chandler talked interestingly of the voyage. After the America 12 and at 4:30 p. m. on Monday, it sailed forthwest over the Missouri for a sumber of miles and then described a fixele and crossed the Mississippi at Strafton, Ills. These three to the stirring sight of three other balloons, one was to the north, and Capt. Chandler believes it was the Serman balloon Pommern. The others were far to the south and he thinks one was the English and the other a French balloon. All were travelling to sast. Practically all of Tuesday night was spent over the mountains. At 4:30 y'clock this morning the aeronauts bassed over Harpers Ferry, and at tunrise they reached the highest altiunrise they reached the hig inde of the voyage.
