life was near its end. I had felt how it you will love me once more! I have been life was near its end. I had felt how it would be, all along. That strange, fragile beauty about her had made me shiver, often with a premonition of coming loss. Because I felt so sure that we were to keep her only for a short time I loved her all the more, and when at last I had to look the her only for a short time I loved her all the more, and when at last I had to look the truth in the face, and admit to myself that the little one's stay on earth was almost over, it seemed as if I could not give her up. I must have something to love. My heart was hungry, starving, for affection, and she had loved me in a baby's way, which is the sweetest way in all the world, aud to let her go out of my life was like tearing away the tondrils of affection from the oaly thing they had to cling to. We watched her fading out of life with a wordless prayer that she might be spared to us, but we knew that the prayer would not be answered in our way. It may have been in God's way. I think it was, for though she died, the baby lives in a life that is immortal, and is spared to us forever. There was need of another flower in the rard on of God. October when the angel came to transplant it from our hom to the green fields of Heaven. It was the saddest day I had ever known, I remember of thinking, as I sat by known, I remember of thinking, as I say by the window and watched the leaves falling slowly, and yet a strange sweetness clings to the remembrance of it. It is strange how every little, common-place thing im-presed itself upon my mind that day. I can look back and see it all—the hazy sky, the woods gay in scarlet and gold, the asters making all the fence-corners purple with bloom, and the torches of the golden red lighting in the nooks and corners of the the window and watched the leaves falling rod lighting up the nooks and corners of the old pasture on the hill, and I can feel the languor of Indian-summer time in the air, and hear the sound of a partridge beating his drum somewhere in the distant woods

All at once the bitterness died out of my heart. The old love swept over it like a flood that bears away all before it.

"Alice," I cried, kneeling down beside her, 'forgive me. I have been wrong ! I have been blind and cruel. I love you still. Let us begin over again, and I will try to
