"It is written with a life and spirit which carry the reader on unflinching, and with an impartiality which does the greatest credit to the writer. . . . The book as full of amusing stories and life-like touches. To those who care to study the doings of the Church of England in the last half-century, it must be deeply interesting. But here will be attraction enough."—Spectator, lxi, 185.

"After Mr. Herbert Spencer's philosophical admiration, Lord Coleridge's polished though rather indiscriminating panegyric, Mr. Arnold's cautious appreciation, and Mr.
 Fray's self-advertising praise, it was, perhaps, well that some student of the people and institutions of the United States should raise his voice in criticism and warning. . . .
 The voice of criticism, however, if it is to serve for guidance or warning, must proceed from accurate knowledge and impartial views. Of these two indispensable qualifications Sir Lepel Griffin possesses neither the one nor the other."—Spectator, lvii, 1640.

"Whatever other qualities the honorable baronet [sic] may possess, he is certainly a good hater. . . . There is a good deal of wholesome criticism, which would have been more effective if the writer had put a little less gall in his ink."—Nation, xxxix, 317.
