

use we had spent
g our honeymoon.
t superannuated.
e with its useful-
et it—the doctor
sum per annum,
o its capabilities.
minutes past two,
ceased to call it a
n
boat and paid a
days afterward

which was a com-
nt of view. A
ons in it which
ining-room and
o be cut up into
, as soon as cir-
lary should be
and windows
t our landlord
ws to the side
l we gave him
m trouble, he
n at the time.
veral windows
ned on hinges
iture did not
y thought of living in this independent, romantic way was so delightful, Euphemia said, that furniture seemed a mere secondary matter.

We were obliged indeed to give up the idea of following the plan detailed in our book, because we hadn't the sum upon which the furnishing of a small house was therein based.

"And if we haven't the money," remarked Euphemia, "it would be of no earthly use to look at the book. It would only make us doubt our own calculations. You might as well try to make brick without mortar, as the children of Israel did."

"I could do that myself, my dear," said I, "but we won't discuss that subject now. We will buy just what we absolutely need, and then work up from that."

Acting on this plan, we bought first a small stove, because Euphemia said that we could sleep on the floor, if it were necessary, but we couldn't make a fire on the floor—at least not often. Then we got a table and two chairs. The next thing we purchased was some hanging shelves for our books, and Euphemia suddenly remembered the kitchen things. These, which were few, with some crockery, nearly brought us to the end of our resources, but we had enough for a big easy-chair which Euphemia was determined I should have, because I really needed it when I came home at night, tired with my long day's work at the office.