Letter from Sergt. Blenkhorn to his parents at Canning: Dear Mother:

Dear Mother:

We left St. Eloi on the — and proceeded to the Somme by short marches, and by train, some two hundred miles. We stopped half way for training were there a week, then took our train and rode about 100 miles in box cars, that being the way soldiers travel in France. We arrived a great deal nearer our destination and got off our train at 5 a.m. Each day we marched a few miles, our beds at night were the ground with a rubber sheet under us and a great coat and the starry skies over us. Did we sleep? Well, I'guess! We always had that good tired feeling, altho the nights were cold, we would never wake until reveille sounded though maybe our feet and hands would be pretty cold but a couple of rounds out of out bedfellows (we usually sleep in pairs) soon set the warm boood in circulation. Sometimes if we were near a lrook or river, we'd make a cash for a dip in the ice cold water before our breakfast of half a canteen of strong, hot tea or coffee, ¼ loaf of bread, a couple of hard tack, a plece of bacon and some cheese. Then the "fall in" would sound and we'd march away, stopping again for dinner. Every day was the same and soon by the terrible cannonading which grew nearer and nearer and was the same and soon by the terrible cannonading which grew nearer and nearer and louder and louder, we could tell we were near the Somme. I hought that when we were at Ypres we heard guns but they sounded like rifles, compared with the roar of these big fellows.

Well, we arrived at Albert, staying there for a few days. When the call came for us to move up nearer the trenches, it did not take us long to get up into some of the ground captured from the Huns. Such sights as I saw and never want to see again. The ground was torn up as by a recent earthquake, villages levelled to the ground: artillery in shell holes; and old trenches pounding away at the villages levelled to the ground; artillery in shell holes; and old trenches pounding away at the Huns as though they were not going to stop until there wasn't a Hun left on the face of Europe; motor larries and transport smashed up; captured German guns and ammunition; all kinds of equipment twisted and battered into so much old junk; German graveyards.

Well, we took up our position in Divisional Reserve. "Fritz" would send over a few shells occasionally generally getting some poor chap, for the men and horses were in regular swarms and as countless as sands on the shore. It looked as if England meant business all right, and she sure did, as we soon found out. soon found out.

right, and she sure did, as we soon found out.

When our chance came, "2nd Division Reserves to take certain frontage"—wow! the news came bringing a thrill of excitment. The 4th and 5th Brigades were the lucky ones to go over and the poor 5th had to stay in Reserve. We thought we'd have to take a back seat but that evening the word came "5th Brigade to go over at 5.30," and go over, we did. I wish I could describe it—it seems like a dream to me though I think I might write a book on that charge, the taking of Corcelette by the 22nd French Canadians and the 25th Nova Scotiaps. We lost lots of good officers and men who went from Halifax with us. We will always remember them—they were some of the best old Nova Scotia could produce, and that we ever had or ever expect to have We took lots of prisoners and souvenirs. We "went over the bags" on the anniversary of our landing in France, Sept. 15th.

After a pretty tough time with no water or food for three days "ere relieved by the 1st Division.

Later. I will write you about my second trip in there, where I got my wound which brought me here to dear old "Blightey" "Executor.
