MADAME'S WARD

BY PAULINE BEVERLY.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

It was some time before any of us could grasp the astonishing fact that mademoiselle had stolen the diamonds. She, and only she, by her own confession, had been the stealthy thief who had pilloled the jewel-cabinet in Natalie's room, and, worse than that, poor girl, despite the inspectors' suspicions, was as innocent of the audacious theft as she had always avowed herself to be. Yes, mademoiselle, the demure and precise, was the thief; and more astounding still—the diamonds were safe, even to the night. Since the night of the robbery they had never been from under the roof of Mount Chavasse. How near the inspector must have been to them in the course of his searching and ferreting. And how, I suppose, we must all have been never to suspect her before. I fancy that was the thought in Madame's head as well as in mine, as between us we read the article, and gradually mastered the contents.

It was a long letter, occupying many pages—a coolly audacious letter, and yet somehow a sad one. It explained more mysteries than that of the jewel robbery; it made many strange things plain, and it told the secret that had existed between the governess and Roger York.

It was a very simple secret, after all, which my friend, in his kindness of heart, had consented to keep for her, and a very miserable one. I must say that I pined for it as I read it, and so did Madame, unless I am mistaken. Briefly, then, it all amounted to this. York and she had first met at the house of his sister in Paris, when he had been upon his yearly visit there, during the year before her appearance at Mount Chavasse. But she was not Miss Valdin, but Mme. Steinhardt, the wife of a cashier at a bank in Paris. Max Steinhardt—a German, by the way—was an awfully extravagant man, and at this time was deeply in debt. Being so, he did what many in that position, with facilities ready to their hands, do—levanted with a large sum of money from the bank. He was captured in a day or two, tried, and sentenced to a long term of imprisonment. This was while Roger was still in Paris; and, with his usual good nature, he had shown great kindness to mademoiselle, and must still call her so, or I shall get things mixed. Then, returning to Whittlesford, he forgot her to all intents and purposes, and neither saw nor heard of her again until the evening of her arrival at the Mount.

Of course, he had never dreamed that the Miss Valdin about whom he had heard us—Nat and myself—grumbled was Mme. Steinhardt, an establishment as uncomfortable as seeing her had been extreme—for this reason. Knowing Madame as he did, he was aware that the wife of a felon would never have found a home at a place as the governess of his adopted daughter, and her real antecedents were known, and in his amazement he nearly blurted out the truth. This mademoiselle knew at least as well as he, and, although by her cool and well-laid plan she contrived to smooth over the awkwardness of the situation for the moment, she knew that, unless she could induce him to give her a pledge of secrecy, he would certainly think it his duty to tell the truth to Madame. That she might endeavor to do this she asked him to let her speak to him quietly, and then followed that interview in the Lady's Walk, so much which they had sprung so much trouble, and which I had seen.

During the interview mademoiselle gave Roger another reason for silence besides that of his natural consideration for her. Max Steinhardt, darling man, dead. A strong, restless, daring man, he had escaped from prison six months before, and his dead body had been found in a river near at hand, although whether his death arose from accident or design there was no way of telling. She had, she said, had a glimpse of his face, and she had seen that he was dead. Her unfortunate husband, dead, her disgrace hidden, her name changed, a home secured, a position secured, she knew she was perfectly safe. She had, she said, been crushed and ruin her by a statement of the cruel unnecessary truth? Roger, soft-hearted always, but particularly so now, had listened as I had, and he would hold his tongue. But, although he pitied mademoiselle, he did not trust her. He felt by no means inclined to take it for granted that Max Steinhardt was dead, and it was to this doubt at first that he had made another sudden journey to Paris. From his sister or his sister's husband he would most likely be able to learn the truth or falsity of the story. But, when he returned, he found that it seemed that mademoiselle, who had been so sure of the truth, for in Paris he saw in the newspaper containing a detailed account of the escape and death of the prisoner, Max Steinhardt. Satisfied, York came back to Whittlesford, and he had never heard of his journey and its results, and, believing that Max Steinhardt was indeed dead, and the secret, such as it was, as safe as himself, ceased to trouble himself about the matter.

Of course, however, the truth was that Max Steinhardt was not dead. He had escaped from prison; but, whoever it was that was found in the river a week or two later, it was certainly not he. Not that his wife believed the report of his death—indeed, until that evening when his sudden appearance before the window at Chavasse had made her shrink in faint amazement, she had never entered her mind to suppose that there had been any mistake. But he had not only escaped from prison, but from France, and, getting to England, desperate and penniless, he had found out his wife. The next day he met her in the park, gave him what money she could spare, and fixed a certain date for him to come again, when she would be able to give him the quarter's salary then nearly due. The date of Natalie's tumble off her horse, when he, the dark, foreign-looking man with the red scar on his forehead, had startled her by his sudden appearance in the lane.

A little while later he was hidden behind the clump of bushes by the gate in the park palings where I afterwards found Virtue Dent crouching on the occasion of her luckless brother's visit to Whittlesford, and where too there had lain concealed that still unknown witness of the interview in the Lady's Walk. No wonder, then, that mademoiselle, who had looked frightened and talked so oddly when I encountered her in the Lady's Walk, she clutched me by the arm, thinking I was her husband. Indeed I scared her so that she was afraid to go back to the house for the money then, or to remain with him for more than a minute. Instead, she stole downstairs in the night when I heard her stealthy footsteps creep past my door. It was her knowledge that her husband was still lurking about Whittlesford and Market Wexford which had made York's second journey to Paris startle her, and had caused her to look so frightened when on his return I had seen the meeting between them outside the rectory gate.

That he did not trust her account of Max Steinhardt's death she well knew—indeed he had as good as told her as much; and her fear was that his suspicions had been aroused and that this second visit might mean inquiries which would finally lead to the discovery. That he would betray the fact that her husband was living, in such a way as to lead to his imprisonment, she did not fear, but she imagined that, if Roger found out the truth, he would be sure enough to cause her dismissal from Chavasse. And this she did not by any means wish, since knowing that her husband lived, she had an object in remaining there, which she stated with a frank boldness and audacity that even on paper was simply marvellous—nothing less than the theft of Natalie's jewels!

Mademoiselle knew the value of the jewels, and that it would be easy for her to take Natalie's—knowing that in her position she was quite clever enough to avert probable suspicion—and, above all, knew that, once safely out of England with them, they would form the basis of a start in life in America. That was her object, and with that in view she took the jewels—she took them later on in the evening, admiring them by means of the key which Natalie, like the careless little creature she was, had left in an unlocked drawer. And too wary to trust to any place of hiding about the house until the first shock and search should be over, and it should be safe to place them in the hands of Max Steinhardt, to the end that he might get clear of the country with them before she herself self quit. Chavasse on Friday afternoon, which was, of course, her ultimate intention, she had absolutely had the coolness for the first two days after the robbery to carry the jewels away in a large pocket-case beneath her skirts. Afterward, when the suspicions took the decided direction which they did take, she had secreted the jewels in a disused room near her own.

LONESDALE QUILTS COOK

Secretary of North Pole Fakir S. S. That He Was Deceived.

[Associated Press.]

New York, Jan. 15. — A Copenhagen dispatch to the New York Times says that Walter Lonsdale, secretary to Dr. Frederick A. Cook, has now lost faith in his employer's story of his expedition to the North Pole. He says that the last letter he received from Cook was dated from a city in South America, and that he had made another sudden journey to Paris. From his sister or his sister's husband he would most likely be able to learn the truth or falsity of the story. But, when he returned, he found that it seemed that mademoiselle, who had been so sure of the truth, for in Paris he saw in the newspaper containing a detailed account of the escape and death of the prisoner, Max Steinhardt. SENDING FILTH INTO FALLS

Pollution of Niagara From the American Side To Be Stopped.

[Associated Press.]

Albany, N. Y., Jan. 17. — Steps are to be taken by State Commissioner of Health E. H. Porter to stop the pollution of the Niagara River by the city of Niagara Falls, N. Y., where it is stated garbage is thrown into the river through a chute below the falls. The attention of the state department was called to the matter by Chas. A. Hodgson, chief health officer of Ontario, who stated that a petition from the town of Niagara Falls, Ont., asking for authority to operate a similar chute in the city of Niagara Falls, had been received by the provincial officials, and asking that if possible steps be taken to prevent the pollution of the river on the American side.

Heaviness at Pit of the Stomach

A Feeling of Uneasiness Before and After Meals Is Quickly Cured With Nerviline.

Nearly everyone gets an occasional attack of indigestion and knows just what that heavy feeling means in the stomach. "I was subject to stomach derangements and my nervous system suffered on account. After meals I belched gas, had a weighty sensation in my stomach and over my left side. The first relief I got was from Nerviline. I used it three times a day and was cured. I continue to use Nerviline occasionally, and find it is a wonderful aid to the stomach and digestive organs."

The above letter comes from Mrs. P. R. Stettin, a well-known merchant in Brockton, and still further proves the exceptional power of Nerviline—furnished by A. E. Rossman, the well-known upholsterer of Chester, who writes: "Let everyone with a bad stomach use Nerviline, and I am sure they will be free of all their troubles. I used to have cramps, rumbling noises, gas on my stomach and severe fits of indigestion. Nerviline was my relief, and I am now entirely satisfied that I would like to have my letter of recommendation published broadcast in order that others may profit by my experience."

Nerviline—it's a trusty household remedy that sells to the extent of a million bottles per year—that's the best proof that it will cure and give unlimited satisfaction. Refuse anything offered in place of Nerviline. Large bottles, 50 cents; trial size, 25 cents. All dealers, or The Catarthosone Company, Kingston, Ont.

NO MERGER FOR POSTAL

Company Claims It Will Remain Independent of Western Union.

[Associated Press.]

New York, Jan. 17. — The petition of the Postal Telegraph Cable Company of New York to change its name to Transcontinental Telegraph Company, is not considered in financial circles as the final public merging of the telephone and telegraph interests of the United States into one company. At the offices of the Postal Company it was explained that the Postal Telegraph Cable Company of New York owned no property in this state and that the change in name was merely transfer several small subsidiary telegraph companies in Montana and other western states, all of which have long been in the Postal system. The object in changing the name, according to Vice-President Adams, is to clarify tax matters in this state.

An official statement, made by the Postal Telegraph and Cable company, says: "The Postal people say that they have been independent, and will continue to be independent, and that they have nothing to do with the Telephone Company or the Western Union, and do not propose to have."

Heike, a New York collector, in speaking of the indictments yesterday against Charles R. Heike, secretary of the American Sugar Refining Company, and five other officials for participation in the "sugar trust" fraud.

DANCING WITH A CORPSE

Outrageous Antic of a Drink-Crazed Negro in Cincinnati.

Cincinnati Jan. 16. — The unusual sight of a negro singing and waltzing down Butler street toward Pearl street with a corpse of a colored woman in his arms, startled Patrolman McCorkhill and Reynolds early yesterday. They closed in on the man, who thereupon dropped the corpse and fled. While one of the officers took after him the other conveyed the body, which later proved to be that of the negro's wife, to her former home on Butler street.

The negro was taken to the police station, where he registered as Thomas Harvey. He was held for one night, when he was released. Harvey, grief-stricken over his wife's death, had left the house in the afternoon, and did not return until midnight, when he was found by police in the house preparing for burial.

According to the police Harvey acted like a wild man. Grabbing a piece of wood from the kitchen, he drove everyone from the house. Then he placed a cigarette in the dead woman's mouth, and taking the body in his arms, started out of the house.

He put the corpse in the front

LAZY MEN IN LONDON IRRITATE THE INSPECTOR

Mr. Sanders Is Out With a Big Stick for That Kind of Characters.

Inspector Sanders is out after the gentlemen who want assistance, and who will not work. "The other day he had a man come to him with a tale of woe—stomach and dying wife, and no coal. The inspector promised to help them, and did so. He turned over to find work for the man. The latter promised to work, of course, but since then he has failed to turn up, and the children were compelled to beg for food. Mr. Sanders has two such cases on his mind now.

"There should be some machinery to deal with such cases," he stated to the Advertiser. "That man should be sent to jail, put to work at some family, or charitable people are willing to assist every case of need, and do help them, but such men as that should be given some punishment."

SOUTH SEA MYSTERIES

United States Fitting Out Expedition To Look Into Them.

Washington, Jan. 16.—An expedition to the South Atlantic and the Antarctic Ocean in the interest of economic and scientific work, by the fish commission steamer Albatross, is under consideration by Secretary Nagel, of the department of commerce and labor.

It was suggested by Henry Osborn, president of the American Museum of Natural History at New York. Mr. Osborn says he recently has received confidential information from one who has returned from the Antarctic that there still remains on certain remote island, herds of southern fur seal, in such numbers as to promise great returns. The definite location of these herds, the discovery of other herds, and the approximate number become desirable, he says, as records for future scientific and industrial work.

For a few years past a whaling industry has developed in the south, rivaling the industry of the north. There are at least four distinct species of whales in the Antarctic. In certain areas they are exceedingly abundant. Mr. Osborn says that he is credibly informed that large number of seal elephants also exist in considerable numbers in the Antarctic region.

Two Mills Using Same Quality of Wheat May Produce Same Quality of Flour

The quality of flour largely depends on the milling. Two mills might grind wheat of the same quality and the product of one far outclass the other. It is not only the high quality of the hard wheat used, but also the superior milling facilities, that places "PURITY" flour so far above all others. Our milling plant at St. Boniface, Manitoba, cost nearly $1,000,000, and is one of the most perfectly equipped mills in the world. The wheat itself is subjected to the most wonderful system of cleaning, scouring, passing, twenty distinct rolls. Fifty-five steel rollers, the largest in Canada, reduce wheat into flour. The purified and dressed "ing" it through silk fine mesh. Not a particle or speck of found in "Purity."

You may have to more for Purity, results, quality and prove it is worth the slight difference.

We have two other modernly equipped mills at Man., and Goderich, Ont.
