

which a piece the size of a millet seed will sweeten a large cup of coffee. The pharmacist, when the chemist has isolated it, prepares it in tabloid form for use by the physician or the public.

Our review has run to greater length than we intended. Our excuse, if one be needed, is the popular character of the article. The object of the editors is to avoid the field of medical literature proper, and not to trench upon the ground specially covered by the Lancet and similar journals; but to furnish articles, not of exclusively professional interest, which may attract attention and awaken interest among that large section of our readers who are not medical students.
