

sales organization with monopoly rights. The Scottish Salmon Growers Association is attempting to regroup small producers so that they can cooperate in supplying larger customers on a continuing basis.

As in Norway, aquaculture development in Scotland does not appear to have led to conflicts between the traditional fishing and aquaculture industries. There are two reasons: one is that aquaculture has developed in areas not linked to the commercial fisheries; the other is that, by North American standards, the commercial salmon fishery is practically non-existent.