Says Correspondents Always Requesting the Sensational

The Anglo-Russian trade agreement should be sufficient guarantee. I am quite satisfied that if a question were asked on the floor of the British House of Commons as to whether Russia, through its purchasing department, had ever dishonored one financial obligation in that time, Sir Philip Cunliffe, later would be compelled to say "no." As a matter of fact, I believe such a question has been asked and no answer given within the twelve months. The various departments of the government make their purchases with the greatest care and with a view to creating as few obligations as possible, realizing full well that a due date is bound to come, and that sufficient money must be in hand to take care of bills.

"But a general survey of conditions in Russia warrants an assertion that the country is in need of many kinds of commodities, and in great quantity. And even though that is true, it is difficult to make sales, even on an offer of extended credit. They do not want to buy more than they can pay for."
