the little one? Can it be that she loves the young strange artist?" he thinks. "If so, better he had never come and I had never seen the gold than that the little one should suffer." Though he suspects it not, Viola reads his thoughts. Soon, to his great relief, once more the bird-like music of her song gushes from her lips as she I was curious to see if you would no flits about the humble home. Viola is but a child in years, but like a woman she can love, and like a woman suffer, yet hide her pain.

A month later ; a lonely cottage upon the shining sands; and without, crouching in an abandonment of grief upon the threshold, with the rose-vines bending as though pityingly, above her young head, is Viola.

"Oh my parents," she cries aloud, "take, oh, take me to you ! I cannot enter ! The loneliness kills me !"

Three days ago the old fisherman's lifeless form had been carried to its last resting-place, and since then, refusing all offers of companionship, Viola has lived alone in her desolate, death-invaded home.

gift of mind and heart.

Elmo tells the tale of his love.

Light steps come swiftly up the marrow path-gentle arms enclasp the sorrowing girl.

"Weep not so bitterly, my child ; there is yet comfort for you."

Looking wonderingly up, Viela's eyes rest upon a lovely, kind face, mournful like her own, as of one who has suffered, yet with a radiance over all such as nes from a heart at rest.

"Do you not remember me?" the strange lady asks.

Into the girl's face rushes a glow of grateful feeling. "Ah, yes! You are the good lady who came to my poor father in his last sickness. Ah, madam, I believed that you were an angel, but I see now that you are alive and in the world like my-

A faint, sweet smile curves the listeners lips at the quaintly uttered reply. "They tell me in the village that tiny ?" yours is a sad case, my child," she says; "that save your father you had no relative-that you are now utterly alone. That is why I am here to-day. From the first moment I saw you, when, following an impulse of charity, when, following an impulse of charty, I came to your dying father, I was drawn irresistibly towards you.
