Woman and the Home.

Early Marriages.

A sweet young girl of only nineteen writes of her engagement to a young man who is but little her senior, not yet twenty-one, and says that though he is one of whom her parents cannot but approve, a member of the same church as herself, industrious, thrifty, honest and upright, her mother wishes the marriage postponed because they are too young, and because "all men are alike," and she dreads to see her daughter repeating her own experience, which, the daughter writes, "has been a baby every year or two since her marriage."

And, under the circumstances, it is hard to advise. The mother has her daughter's best interests at heart and should be her best counsellor. But—though I was once greatly opposed to early marriages, I have known from observation that very many marriages made when both parties were young have resulted very happily. And, as a dear woman who has had some heart-rending experiences in her own girlhood once said to me: "I think it is wisest that some of our boys and girls should marry young. It steadies them and some are particularly subject to temptations that might overcome them and ruin their lives."

And so, dear girl, I do not know. I can only say, talk over the matter again with your mother, weigh her objections very carefully, and she should also talk with the young man, as you cannot, and be sure that he understands the full nature of the responsibilities he would assume. Though he is so very young, perhaps observation has given him some lessons, too, and led him to the determination to prove, as it has to others, that all men are not alike in their marriages and home relations. Some there are whose love is stronger than desire, whose higher natures rule the lower, the spiritual the physical, and to whom the vow to love, honor and cherish is not a mere meaningless repetition of words in the marriage ceremony, but the most solemn vow a man can make in this life, who know that if they and the sweet young girls they have won for their wives are to know true happiness together each must practice self control in all things, after marriage as well as before.

As to the baby every year or two, while the majority of women welcome maternity and rejoice in the blessings of motherhood, and perform its duties cheerfully, yet—there is a limit to the mother's powers, and when she must be also nurse, cook, laundress, seamstress, and housekeeper, and there is not means to comfortably provide for a large family, she should place a limit upon the number of offspring.

Superior Women.

I so often hear some one say: "Is not that a very superior woman?" and I come to wonder or think about these superior women and ask myself what constitutes an ideal woman. Is it one of those women who go about seeking to do their duty by showing other people where they are remiss? By giving advice to everyone, whether asked or not? And who are far too good and pure to come in contact with sin or suffering? Is it that woman who is always talking about some special mission and neglects all those duties which lie nearest while she looks for something higher? No, not her. My ideal superior woman has a mission—always has a mission. And it is to make life brighter and happier for those around her; she makes the best of her surroundings, pleasant or otherwise. She is sure to have the love and respect of everyone. And the fallen or afflicted know her by the helping hand she extends, and the kind, helpful words which fall from her lips. Some way, by intuition, she knows how to bring out the best qualities of those about her, and believes in the goodness of her fellow men. I have seen her when "the world" held up its hands in horror and condemned some "poor unfortunate." She would be so sweetly charitable, willing to allow repentance and present good conduct to atone for mistakes and wrong-doing in the past, believing with Longfellow, "Let the dead past bury its dead."

But she does demand the same code of morals for both sexes, and thinks that equal purity and co-education of the sexes is best possible and desirable, and hopes and prays for the day when the unwritten law of equal morals for both sexes will govern society. In her work as wife, mother and home-maker she is doing a noble work. Love reigns there, and truth, justice and charity are some of the lessons taught. She knows she cannot change the world and its ways, but she tries to so educate her boys and girls that they may not yield to its many temptations. She knows that a broad, generous education is what is most needed—educated, deep-thinking, cultured men and women who bravely proclaim their ideas for the mental and moral advancement of the world and the progress of true civilization. I believe these are some of the characteristics of a superior woman, although she may never realize the fact herself. In every sense of the word she is a noble, true-hearted, honest woman who tries to live and to be just what she wishes her children to be, and although the true beauty and unselfishness of her character is not fully understood at the time by them, it is afterwards, and strengthens them for the trials and temptations which come in after years to one and all. The world is full of these mothers, wise, great-hearted and true, whose moral bravery fits them to adorn the highest station in life; whose happy homes are their reward for doing their daily duty, and whose influence will be far-reaching and powerful.

Is it Worth While?

The question is often asked if the higher education is worth while—if enough is gained to compensate for the means, the time and strength expended. To one who has attained the heights and looks back to the mediocre condition from whence he has climbed, such a question seems preposterous.

He has found that education has not only trained the mind and revealed unknown mental powers, but it has opened up new and rare fields of enjoyment and opportunity. So much of nature that was before but a closed book is now an unending and constant source of enjoyment. The hidden courses of things, elementary forces and their work through countless ages, have been revealed to him; the secret of the stars has been told and the scroll of the universe unrolled; the best and greatest men of all ages have become through the printed page his instructors and friends; the echoes of the past are in his ears, presaging yet greater things and greater hope for the future; his nature has been deepened, enriched and broadened in every way, enlarging by many fold his capacity not only of enjoyment, but of usefulness to his fellow men; he is like a king that has come to his inheritance, who finds his life so rich and full and joyous that he cannot imagine how one can question if it were worth while to seek it.
