With regard to the excitement which this law has kindled in the public mind, the Journal of Commerce is under no mistake. The excitement is intense, and is extending itself every hour. This morning the mails brought us the following letter, with published:-

"MERIDEN, CONNECTICUT, Oct. 16, 1850. "MERIDEN, CONNECTION, Oct. 10, 100."
"We had a noble and spirited meeting in this village, last evening, relative to the 'fugitive slave law." The citizens assembled to hear an address from Mr. Africanus, a colored gentleman.

an indignation which will nurr them and savery to rain."

The language of the Resolution, adopted with so much enthusiasm at Meriden, does not necessarily imply that the laws will be resisted by violence, but it is clear that when a law is so heartify detested, violence can hardly fail to arise from a pertinacious attempt to carry it into effect. How the free colored population of the North are affected by it, how sensible they are of the danger in which they stand of being carried away into slavery under it, and how strong is the determination not to submit to any such an abuse of its provisions, may be understood from the narrative of an unfortunate occurrence which took place at Aquackarcick, in new Jersey, on Saturday evening last. It is related in a letter which appears in the Tribune of this morning is—village, last evening, relative to the 'fugitive slave law.' The citizens assembled to hear an address from Mr. Africanus, a colored gentleman. He is a man of fine personal appearance, and good talents. In an address of an hour and a half, he dissected the law, clearly pointed out its outrageous violations of the constitution and of the Divine law, and appealed with great power to the hearts and intellects of his hearers.

"At the close of the meeting a resolution was introduced,' pledging ourselves to protect a refugee from bondage in the midst ot us, from all attempts in reduce him to slavery under this law.' The house was crowded and enthusiastic, and the reresolution passed without one discenting voice.
