HELEN MOIR

Love and Honour.
A TALE OF THE CLYDE.
CHAPTER XVI.

THE SACRIFICE COMPLETED—DAYS OF DARKNESS—ANOTHER TERRIBLE REVELATION. In this terrible crisis of heart and mind, Helen found in Mrs. Allerton a true and comforting friend. She seemed to understand her more readily, and appreciate her feelings more fully than any of the others. When poor Helen threw herself on her bosom, and with many tears told her what had occurred, and its cause Mrs. Allerton was strangely moved. She turned pale, and a peculiar shadow of pain came over her grave, thoughtful face. For some time she did nothing but hold Helen in silence in her arms, stunned as it seemed, by something more than the discovery and its result. Her mind was as sent in upon itself, and upon a brooding sorrow, which in past years had placed those lines upon her brow which had told of suffering and of grief.

Helen, interpreting her silence as a disapproval of the course she had taken, gazed up at her with a pleading look, and flatteringly asked if this were so. "It is all so sudden, dear, and so strange, that I cannot as yet think calmly about it. Whether you have taken the only right and proper course requires more consideration than I have yet had time to give; but there can be no doubt, my darling, that you have acted very nobly and self-denyingly. If there is error on your part, it is all on the side of virtue, integrity, and truth, and the splendour of your motive and intention must command the love and admiration of every pure soul."

"Oh, I could have done nothing else," pleaded Helen with tearful earnestness. "If I had, I should have degraded myself and Hermann, and destroyed our true happiness."

"I think so too, my love. Lofly natures and exalted souls, such as you and Hermann possess, require the most exalted surroundings; and what would not injure beings less sensitive would assuredly hurt and harm you. In most cases this discovery need not have called for the same sacrifice—nay, it would never once have been thought of, and still no evil would have followed; but with you—yes, Helen, I feel that this heroic deed was demanded; and terribly as he may feel the blow, I am sure it raises you even higher in Hermann's esteem."

"Bless you, my more than mother," cried Helen, "bless you for thus giving support to my sinking heart."

And again in a transport of emotion, the agitated girl flung herself on Mrs. Allerton's bosom, and was folded there in an embrace of peculiar tenderness and love.

But probably Mrs. Allerton and Hermann himself were the only ones among Helen's friends who fully understood the necessity which constrained her to make this dreadful sacrifice. The others regarded it as something heroic, but they wondered at it, and sorely regretted it. No one was more grieved and disappointed than Ritchie Dunlop. He quite expected that the knowledge of her father's crime would make her very unhappy, and to save her from this he had carefully concealed the truth from her and from every one. But he had not conceived it possible that the discovery on her part would have led to an effect so extraordinary and terrible, and poor Ritchie puzzled his honest mind in vain to understand it, and just in proportion to his inability to understand it was his disappointment, and his rage against Victor Dubosque, whose base, malevolent vindictiveness had wrought the evil. Ritchie had by no means a vengeful nature, but he had a most intense desire to give the Frenchman a rough handling. "I was just like tea writing his neck," was about the mildest of his muttered desires in relation to him, and assuredly, if circumstances should turn up to bring Ritchie and Dubosque into contest, the Frenchman need expect no forbearance at the latter's hand.

But Ritchie, as we know, had another and peculiar reason for being sorely exercised in mind, arising from the discovery he had made regarding David Bridgenorth. This was a discovery known as yet only to himself, but he did not know how long this might be so. He did not know what intentions Bridgenorth might entertain, or whether it might be his purpose to reveal himself to Helen. Even if he did not do so, the hunchback might give the secret as another weapon to Dubosque for the farther gratification of his vengeful disposition. Altogether, therefore, Ritchie was, as he inwardly designated it, "in a honny pickle," and went to and fro saying nothing, but observing everything with keen anxiety and unenviable expectation.

The days passed on, but oh, how changed from the happy time which had preceded. The pain and sorrow which must inevitably flow from the separation they had made were settling down upon the saddened hearts of Hermann and Helen. They could not meet as heretofore and enjoy each other's society. Their love was, if possible, greater, tenderer, stronger than ever, yet they could not show it, could not indulge it. Hermann came sometimes to Ardenham, but his pain while there was even greater than when he was absent, and he wandered away by himself in other directions, to be alone with his misery, to wrestle with his disappointment, and, if possible, to gain the victory over his rebellious heart. And Helen, what shall we say of her? How did these dark and dreary days pass for her? Sadly enough; but they were rendered less dreary and desolate by the society and the tender solacing ministrations of Mrs. Allerton, who was to her in this crisis as a very mother.

BRAMPTON—EPP'S COCOA—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many a heavy doctor's bill.—Civil Service Gazette. Made simply with boiling water or Each packet is labelled "James Epps & Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London." Also, makers of Epps's Milky Cocoa (Cocoa and Condensed Milk).

Cut this notice out and bring it with you. We are authorized to refund the cash to any person or persons who shall buy and use Parson's Purgative Pills and fail of relief and satisfaction.

A HOUSEHOLD REMEDY.—No family should be without some efficacious remedy for the cure of affections, so universally prevalent, as coughs, colds, sore throat, whooping-cough, and croup—some remedy, too, which can be relied upon as safe, sure and certain. Dr. Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry combines this desideratum.

THE relaxing power of Johnson's Anodyne Liniment is truly wonderful.—Cases are already numerous where bent and stiffened limbs have been limbered and straightened by it. When used for this purpose, the part should be washed and rubbed thoroughly. Apply the liniment cold, and rub it in with the hand.
