"Consideration be hanged!" said the doctor, dropping decorum in his vexation. "Conjuring up pique, spleen, pride and dyspepsia in this air: "Lindesay. I am ashamed of you! It would take a whole troop of plue devils to put such notions into Eoyiston's happy-go-lucky nature, I think! Here, Miss Gladys, is a fellow who, to my certain recollection, is a first-rate oarsman, danger and athlete, a favorite in the ball-room when he chooses to go there, and entertaining in small talk when he condescends to it—I hereby hand him over to you as master of ceremonies, in the gay world of Mount Desert. Tell him that you want to be entertained; that you are a little new in this new world of ours, though quite at home in the old world, and ask him to show you the way in it."

"I shall be glad if he will do it," said Gladys, looking at him half shyly from laughing eyes.

Gladys, looking at him hair snyly from laughing eyes.
"I shall be glad if I may try," returned the young man; and for the rest of the walk, laying aside the constrained, haif bitter tone in which he had hitherto spoken, he launched into a stream of bright talk, so entertaining, so contagious, that Gladys forgot her reserve and

"That is a more entertaining young man than I have ever met in America." said Gladys, in the demure, yet outspoken way which delighted the old doctor. "I am sure there is nothing the matter with him except what he fancies."

"Exactly so, my dear; but Raymond Lindesay, is proud—sensitively, morbidly so—and, because he is, his fancies are especially bad for him. He lost, two years ago, a father and the expectation of a fortune at the same moment; more, he found that he had inherited debts and a name which was not so unblemished in honor as he had supposed. He gave up the career which he had planned, and threw himself, heart and soul, into paying off his father's old scores and leaving his memory as bright as might be. He has worked like a slave for his mother and sixters, and will do it, I fancy, all his life. A noble fellow, but one with a morbid effect of 1 suppose some uncharitable acres and might be still, if he would let anyone come within a mile of him. Rut he is proud and fancibul. You heard how he spoke of Boylston—the most good-hearted boy alive?"

"What a pity!" oned Gladys. "It is cuite unwaring of him, law to the law to the law to the law of the law of him, surt it? He must he had be a law of the law of law of laws."

"What a pity!" cried Gladys. "It is guite unworthy of him, isn't it? He must be, he is such a five character."

CHAPTER V.

Next morning dawned a rare day, full of golden sunshine, warm as July should be, out with a gentle breeze rippling the be, out with a gentle breeze ripping the blue water, and making it kiss the peb-bles with a sweeter murmur. Inland the air was clear and the scent of the pines came out in the searching sunshine with romatic fragrance; but out beyond the little Porcupine Islands a soft pink haze hing, closing in like a sudden horizon repnd the Happy Isle. Gladys, waiking along the lovely shore road with a merry party of girls and young men, over rocks and pebbles, through russic stilles and across the green.

through rustic stiles, and across the green lawns of charming cottages, stopped all at once under a great pine tree. "Oh, Madge, leave me here for awhile! I really want to sketch."

I really want to sketch."
"On a sheet of birch bark, with a thorn for a pencil." laughed Madge.
"No; I have my sketch-book."
"Oh. Miss Lyman, you are incorrigible!" said young Clifford. "Always improving the shining hours till we drones are put. to the blush!"

the shining hours till we drones are put to the blush!"

"I did not know their complexions admitted of that," said Gladys, with a twinkling dimple. "No, I'm not so dreadfully industrious, Mr. Clifford, but I should like to send papa that lovely little peep across the water."

"Should I be very much in the way if I stayed, too?" asked the youth. "I could hold the pencils."

"There's only one," said Gladys, "and I'm afraid I should not be an entertaining companion if I were sketching. No, Mr. Clifford, you will find it a great deal more amusing to walk on with the others. I will be quite ready when you come back, Madge."

But Madge's red parasol, and young Boylston, who was holding it over her head, were already far in advance. Gladys threw herself down under the great pinetree, half reproving herself for the satisfaction with which she watched poor Clifford's reluctantly retiring footsteps, but feeling dimly that his platitudes and laborious gallantry would have been a profanation of the summer morning. For a fime she sat quite still, auxuriating in the deep shadow of the pine, the whisper of the waves as they broke on the tiny pebbled beach at the foot of the cliff, and the mingled breath of wood and sea. Then, drawing sketch-book and pencil from her pocket, she fell industriously to work. At first she was too much absorbed in her occupation to notice more than her immediate surroundings, but presently, leaning farther forward in her study of the liftle islands, she spied, at the foot of the cliff, the straw hat of a young man. Something in his attitude as he lounged on the pebbles, turning the leaves of a book, made her lock again. It was Raymond Lindesay.

"Now, why," said Gladys to herself with a twinge of vexation that was almost laughable, "is he not walking with the others, or sailing with Mr. Marston and Henry Follen? None of the party are studying, I know. Either of those things would be better for him than poring over a book. I suppose he persuaded himself that they did not want him."

staded nimself that they did not want him."

"She watched him with growing concern and a naive sense of responsibility. The reader, all unconscious of the scrutiny, presently raised his hat, ran his fingers through his hair, sighed and turned back with rather a listless air to the book.

"I don't believe it interests him," said Gladys to herself, "and there is nothing worse for the mind than forced attention."

Worse for the mind than forced attention.

With a sudden impulse of mischief she pulled a pine-cone from the branch nearest her, and let it fail on the straw hat; then, much shocked by her own boldness, drew far back from the edge of the cliff. When she ventured to peep again, Linesay had closed the book; he lay stretched on the pebbles, idly playing with the pine-con- and watching the waves. Gladys worked busily at her sketch, glad that her unwonted bit of mischief had escaped detection, but wishing that he would come up and join her. Meanwhile, Lindesay, not in truth, as Gladys had clanced, in raising his eyes, to spy the broad hat and busy finestrate oarsman, dancer and athlete, a first-rate oarsman, dancer and athlete, a favorite in the ball-room when he chooses to go there, and entertaining in small talk when he condescends to it—I hereby hand him over to you as master of ceremonies in the gay world of Mount Desert. Tell him that you want to be entertained; that you are a little new in the community of the face under the deep shade, had only turned back to the water with a half-annoyed "Impossible to be alone on this shore!" Presently, however, another upward glance revealed Gladys' fair face and light curling locks under the broad brim just then opportunely raised for a saze at the islands. He sprang to his feet with alaerity.

"Good morning, Miss Lyman! May I come up?"

"Good morning, Miss Lyman: May come up?"
"I am very glad you are coming at last," said Gladys, demurely. "I think you have been sitting long enough with that book in your hand."

"What?" asked Raymond curiously, as she hesitated.

"That you knew a little better what was good for you! You work hard over those unstudious young men; now, don't you know that when recess comes, you cught to walk or sail or do anything but read all alone?"

"Very likely," said the young man, not loath to argue the case with such an opponent, "but there are two things to be considered. First, the reading must be done sometime, and secondly, solitude is a necessity when one's society is not in demand."

"Mr. Lindesay!" cried Gladys, suspending her penell over the sketch and looking, in her eagerness, extraordinarily bright and earnest, "that, I am sure, is a morbid fancy! You think you are shunned, and that makes your manner repellent. Just promise me that you will try for one week taking your share in whatever is doing, and I am sure you will find yourself welcomed. The fault is yours. Do promise me!"

London Hockey Team Plays Draw Game With Aberdeens.

The Big Fight Declared Off-Andy Ward Looking for a "Go"-Racing Results.

> HOCKEY. A DRAW GAME.

A picked team' from Western Ontario ran up against the Aberdeens of Ottawa at the Jubilee Rink on Saturday night, and the game resulted in a tie. It was the first of the Carling Cup series, and the match was a decidedly fast one. Local enthusiasts were surprised on seeing the London (?) team line up on the ice, to find that Hobbs, Peel, Ashplant, Hearn and the rest of the local seven were conspicuous by their absence. The newcomers in London uniforms were known to very few in the rink, and consequently there was considerable disappointment among the crowd, who expected to see the local boys uphold the honor of the town. It appears that the Ottawa seven declined to play with the expelled members of the London team, and the management theretie. It was the first of the Carling don team, and the management therefore decided to substitute a picked team, rather than have the game called off. Saturday's game was therefore a battle between the best of London and district and the pick of the Ottawa circuit.

There was a delay of 20 minutes in starting, owing to the non-appearance of Fred Chittick, of Ottawa, who had been agreed upon as referee, but who failed to appear. Then Jack Hobbs was agreed upon for the first half, and the Ottawa men given the privilege of naming a man in the second period.

The score at half-time was 1-1.

The second half was fast Mouston.

The second half was fast. Morrison scored the first goal for London. Then Ottawa woke up and tallied twice, putting them two goals in the lead. London scored another and Ottawa came back again. The red, white and black forwards worked a combination for the seventh goal, making the total 4-3. O'Connor kicked the puck past Bishop, but the goal judge properly refused to allow the score. There were only 50 seconds left to leave the second seconds. were only 50 seconds left to play, and from the face-off Westcott carried the puck down, passed to Stevens, who sent it to Morrison, and the center man fired a wicked shot that tied the score. This ended the scoring, leaving the game a tie. London wanted to continue the game

ENTITLED TO CONSIDERATION.

Galt Reporter: We will venture to say there is not a team in Ontario which has not at present or at some time in its history either played with or against professionals. Take the cases of some of the London men. They probably had no more idea who Winn was or that Hern was other than represented than some of the Stratford players had of Easson's or Wood's offenses. They are now suffering through the actions of unscrupulous officials. We are not citing these cases as an excuse for the players, but merely to point out where they are entitled to consideration, where such notorious players are allowed to stay in the ranks as some that are now posing as amateurs in the association. ENTITLED TO CONSIDERATION.

BASEBALL

The Galt Reformer, alluding to base-ball prospects in that town and surroundings, says: As for league prospects, nothing has yet been done, owing to the season being far off. London, however, has written with a view to reimpregnating the old London, Galt, Guelph and Hamilton combine. No action has as yet been taken, but such an idea may ultimately be fulfilled.

The Canadian record of 1:513-5, for the 880 yards, boys, was lowered to 1:412-5, and in the one mile, boys, 15 years and under, a new record of 3:20 was established, a Canadian amateur record, beating the American record of 3:313-5, and the Canadian record of 3:20-5. The races were held under the auspices of the National Skating Association of America and the Amateur Skating Association of Canada, and were witnessed by
