Mr. Jones criticised the engineer for not doing what he had promised in putting in place the gate and valve which he said had been ordered. Then there was the suggestion that the G. T. R. should widen the cove bridge.

This, Engineer Graydon had said, was possible, but not probable.

This was the beginning of the fun. Two young men came up to the front seat to encourage Mr. Jones, and at this point one of them wanted to know why it wasn't probable. Mr. Jones told him to keep order.
"I'm asking a question," was the answer. "Aren't you talking?"

The other young man wanted to know "what Graydon knew about it." The crowd laughed, and there were cries of "Put him out!" but the chair-man adopted a new scheme. He in duced one of the men to go on the platform beside him, and thus were the two separated, though they still continued o second everything that was said. Mr. Jones went on. The board of works had about $16,000 a year to run the department on. How could they get $20 000 to build a breakwater out of that? How could they get money exept by debenture issue

Attacked Mr. Haselgrove. "No man can throw slurs at me," began the speaker, when suddenly the man beside the chairman was struck with a brilliant idea, and asked. "What would you do for a fellow if you were worth a million?" The speaker took no notice of the question, except that he was annoyed by the consequent laughter, but he started to sail into Mr. Haselgrove, referring to market meetings and Socialism, "Socialism might be all right, but." he started, when somebody interrupted in stentorian tones, "The breakwater, the breakwater." Someon else added their comment about this meeting not being called to talk Sorialism. The two chief disturbers got up and walked out, one of them stopping in front of Mr. Jones and saying, Yes, stick to the breakwater." When the noise subsided Mr. Jones informed the audience that the property in West London was valued at $500,000, and there was no reason why t should not go to half a million. harged Mr. Haselgrove with simply refusing to receive notices of committee meetings from him, and stated that he objected to being made a cat's paw. Mr. John Pierce claimed the right to indulge in the controversy, even if Mr. Jones did think a tenant had no rights. He started out to tell how he had been put on the committee, and did not know it until the next evening Mr. Jones said. "I see by The Advertiser, your name is on the committee; I say you won't sit on the committee." The speaker had told Mr. Jones that the latter would get trimmed. Mr. Jones had said he always acted like a rentleman. Mr. Jones here asked the speaker to

He had accused him of belonging to a foreign element. The speaker started to introduce socialism, but was interrupted from the back of the hall. and when he spoke of those who owned a few feet of land, Mr. Jones again mentioned the breakwater. Then Mr. Pierce said: "I promised to meet Mr. Jones. Now I have got him where I want him."
