GREAT BRITAIN, CANADA

There is a saying that it is hard to ceedingly difficult to convince a certain | spent." class of people in Great Britain that anything good can come out of a mere colony. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company is having constructed some steamers of the first class-in British shipyards. The agents of the company have been telling the newspaper men of the Old Country that when their ships are placed in commission the time between British ports and the ports of Canada, Japan, China and Australia will be greatly reduced. All of which is received with scepticism by journals devoted to the interests, apparently, of existing steamship lines. The Maritime Review, with a wit as boisterous as an Atlantic mid-winter sea, says that "as a matter of fact we can readily believe that the steamers will have a registered tonnage ranging into the 14,000-odd mark; that they are considerably larger than any hitherto trading between England and Canada; that they have eight (or eighteen) decks; and are to be magnificently appointed with all the latest improvements-and which points we cull from the contemporary already alluded to. We can believe the foregoing, because the steamers are building at the Fairfield Company's yard, and that is precisely a place where they are no slouches at the work. What we should like to know, is whether the words 'all the latest improvements,' include a patent fog dispeller, for if it doesn't, days touch.'

Again: "We presume that the griefs which have surrounded the Allan liners to have matters dispatched with have not been already forgotten? Indeed, we much doubt if the unfortunate voyagers therein will ever forget those griefs; but as well as we remember, the voyages went merry as the marriage bell, until the vicinity of ject. 'I have already said that I should Quebec river was reached. That was where the starch was taken out of the people's raiment-to say nothing of sundry portions of bottom out of the with this spending of so much time steamers. And we have an idea that nobody, on either of those occasions. was unduly bursting to make six-day crossings? Anyhow, the six days' crossing didn't come off in the steamer; and as already suggested, we shall patiently await the efforts of those new Canadian Pacific railway boats. We shall, really! We note that the same Mr. Flannagan is represented as having said-at the same psychological period-and in connection with Canasage to Canada be shortened, but the journey across the continent is to be to the Far East."

Its advocacy tage in the competition for the transportation business of all the continents, so that the old-established institutions which appear to consider any attempt to divert traffic from the oldestablished ports might as well make up their minds for the impending change.

It is satisfactory to note, after a perusal of a great deal of matter illustrative of the conservative, and sometimes intolerant, spirit of British institutions, that it is conceded that after all some good things may come from one of the colonies. The Maritime Review goes on to say:

"O, WISE JUDGE!"

At this season of the year it is cusomary for mankind to form good resolutions, make a note of the same with a hand of more or less firmness, and to turn down the leaf with a sense of creditable. As the year progresses in the vast majority of instances it will be necessary to make records of many lapses; but still the intentions are generally well meant, and have some effect on the life of the community. We observe by some remarks which fell from the lips of Mr. Justice Morrison of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, quoted in the Vancouver World, that he is anxious that the members of the legal profession should imbibe, let us say, a double portion of the spirit of the new year and, in a mood of self-abnegation, work for the reform of abuses which are undoubtedly bringing upon the fraconsiderable force to the methods of certain causes at the present time particularly. The World's report says: spun out proceedings and suggested in no uncertain language that this practice was sometimes followed for the that the new year was beginning and greater expedition. Later on in the sitting, which took place in Supreme Court chambers, His Lordship, premising that his remarks had no special application to counsel in the particular case before him, returned to the sublike to inaugurate a reform with the new year.'
