Resumption of Active Business

Retail trade is very good; textile mills are increasing their output; and raw material buying is distinctly stronger.

There is a steady relaxation of trade restrictions on the part of the Government, and a steady, though slow return to normal conditions.

The Government is selling its accumulated stocks of war materials, and in a short time will cease to exert a controlling influence over most industries.

Business recovery will come as soon as business men are convinced that normal standards again prevail, and that they can apply to their business problems the same bases of judgment on which they formerly relied.

Such lack of demand for labor as exists is largely temporary, and should disappear rapidly with the resumption of normal activities.

Important developments which are expected to benefit the entire business machine of the country are now in the making in the iron and steel industry.
