PROGRESS OF THE WAR
[August 31 to September 6]

In the week under review the war entered the second month of the third year of its course. Over a greatly extended battle front, conquest on the part of Rumania in the war, the Central European Powers were steadily maintained, and a most strenuous week and were unable to secure any decisive or permanent success at any point, but, on the contrary, were forced to yield ground in several of their most strongly held positions.

On the Western front the British and French made important gains north and south of the Somme, the fighting being almost unprecedented ferocious. They took a very large number of prisoners and a great quantity of heavy ordnance and machine guns, and ammunition. The losses in killed and wounded were heavy on both sides. In the Verdun sector, heavy fighting was steadily maintained, the French holding their ground and the Germans being unable to make any advance whatever. There was some fighting in the Vosges, but no change of positions resulted.

In the Eastern campaign only artillery duels were reported, the front from Riga to the Pripiet; but further south in Volynia, and in Galicia the Russians made further gains and took many thousands of prisoners and much booty. In cooperation with the Rumanians they pressed forward through the Carpathians and were beginning to occupy the eastern extremity of Transylvania; while to the southwest the Rumanians continued their advance over the Transylvanian Alps and were beginning to occupy the town of Hermanstadt. The Austro-Hungarian troops made comparatively feeble resistance to the oncoming Rumanians.

In the Caucasian Campaign the Russians defeated a large body of Turks west of Erzerum, taking many prisoners; and they also made further advances south and west of Lake Van, and aggressively resumed the offensive in Persia.

Little news of the operations in Mesopotamia was received, the only news being that the British had advanced to the Tigris, and nothing of importance appears to have occurred.

The only event reported in the Egyptian campaign was a hostile air raid on Port Said, but no details were given of the damage inflicted.

From German East Africa it was announced that the British had taken Mogoro, the German headquarters, and had occupied Dar es Salaam, the capital, and chief seaport of the colony and terminus of the Central Railway on the Indian Ocean. It would thus appear that the whole of this railway, 700 miles in length, is now in possession of the British and Belgians, the terminus on Lake Tanganyika having been taken some time ago. The Germans, evidently, must be forced very soon to make their last stand in the last colony of which any portion is still in their occupation.

Of the Balkan campaign the week furnished considerable news of important events, not the least significant of which was a further note from the Entente Allies to the Hellenic government demanding the control of the postal and telegraphic services and the expulsion of the German propagandists, to which the Hellenic government had already acceded in progress throughout the week from the Albanian coast to eastern Macedonia, and the Entente Allies were able to hold the Bulgarians and Teutons in check and to force them back at some points. The Balkan struggle was extended to a conflict between Bulgarians and Rumanians, the Bulgarians scoring an initial success by invading western Rumania; but the Rumanians soon drove back all the Bulgarians and Teutons who had advanced from Serbia across the Danube; and they also took the important Bulgarian town of Rutchuk south of the Danube.

The Austro-Italian campaigns progressed favorably for the Italians, hostilities being steadily maintained at many points over the entire front.

A sensation of the week was an air raid on England on the night of September 2, the fleet of Zeppelins numbering thirteen, the greatest number yet assembled in a single raid. As a result of the raid one man and one woman were killed and eleven men and women and two children were injured. The material damage, none of which was military, was somewhat extensive, but details have not been given out. One Zeppelin was exploded by torpedoes from a British aeroplane and fell to the ground at Enfield, north of London, all its crew being killed. Another Zeppelin was injured, and it is believed its crew was drowned off the Zealand coast. As a reprisal a British air raid on Hoboken did great damage to German shipping, and another damaged an aerodrome near Brugge.

The Entente Allies destroyed a German submarine off Flanders, Greece, and seized all the Austrian and German ships in the harbor of Piraeus. An allied fleet of 23 warships and a number of transports made a demonstration at Piraeus to enforce the demands of the Entente Allies upon the Hellenic government. There was somewhat less disaster than usual to shipping through mines and submarine activities, all the cases reported being given in "News of the Sea." It would seem that the efforts of the British and French navies to deal with hostile submarines are steadily becoming effective.
