HE CARDINAL'S MESSAGE TO ATHOLIC ELECTORS.

ADDRESS BY THE CARDINAL. a matter of the greatest satisfacbeheld that great meeting he saw to him to hear them singing their nns so heartily in unison. When ot only those actually present, but e far greater number whom they ented - the Catholic working men throughout the whole country. who were working perhaps undor hard and difficult conditions. That great body of men also represented nething else—the power which the working man possessed as an elector. That nower could be used for good of for harm, or it might even be left uncould be used for good or harm, or not rred, by his position, from taking and active part in politics; but he had vertheless to consider the question of what must be the position, in poliical matters, of sincere, earnest Catlics, who were obedient to the voice of their Church. The Church had never professed to lay down any hard nd fast rule regarding politics. The Church had to deal with the moral law, and to pronounce definitely eon: it was no part of her Divine-Mitics. The Church had; however, aid down very definite rules in regard to any political party which taught, definitely and overtly, principles opposed to those which she herself lays down for the guidance of her members; and Catholics might according to the Church's teaching, belong to any political party whose principles were in direct opsition to her own. He was glad to hink that, at the present time in this country, there was no political party which was openly and directly in opposition to the Catholic Church. very near to that position, for at that time constant and direct attacks were made by the Liberal Party against Labour Party in this country which particular. His Eminence said that he Continental countries Socialism, was attacks Catholics were obliged to Church. He had reason to believe point of view, for the Labour Party to principles and teachings. His version of the words was that the Cardinal had advanced the opinion that the views of the Labour Party in England approximated more nearly to Catholic principles than did those of any other party. "I never said that," His Eminence declared emphatically. What he (the Cardinal) did say, and meant to say, was that on certain questions the policy of the eaders of the Labour Party unconiously had changed to something nuch pearer to Catholic principles than had formerly been the case. he had not excluded other parties a matter of fact, he did not see h statesmen in any party could approach certain moral and social problems without tending more and more to the Catholic view.

Returning to the main issue, His ninence said that, as at present no litical party in this country was enly opposed to Catholic principles, tholics might therefore belong to any party they chose. But they mus bear in mind three things: First, that no man could go the whole way with his party; because every party was guided in this country by men who ery often did not know, and certainly did not yet accept, all the principles of the Catholic Church. Secondly Catholics must go straight, in obedi-ence to the voice of conscience, and eep their party straight. Then, agai but he hoped this was a very far-of
