The Foster Brother;

The Orphan of the Wreck. CHAPTER XXIV. WITHIN DOORS.

This naturally leads us to speak of the state of mind in which Lillias was spending that important day. Obeying her father's injunction, communicated in a cold and haughty manner by her step-mother, she had remained in the solitude of her own chamber, and as that apartment was at the rear of the mansion, which commanded no view of the avenue or the park, she had not an opportunity of knowing what was taking place downstairs.

But, oh, how busy was she with anxious conjectures and exciting surmises. Happily ignorant as yet of the dreadful tragedy which had been enacted on the previous evening, she dreamed not of the crushing weight of woe that was coming upon her, but sat wondering what would be the result of Harry's interview with their father, and how the latter would receive the astounding information he had to give him. That a storm had burst forth she could not doubt—she knew her father too well to imagine otherwise—but what the effect would be as regarded herself she feared to imagine. Her hope and trust was all in Harry, and he was so brave, and had become so manly, that she had every hope of him proving to her an efficient protector. He had spoken so confidentially of saving her from the dreaded marriage into which her father sought to force her, and in a tone so hopeful and certain of her union with George, that her heart had beat and throbbled with wildest joy, and hope and expectation ever came uppermost amid the struggling feelings of her bosom.

The hours passed, and no one came to her. She began to wonder at being left so long in ignorance. Harry must have seen their father by that time. Why, then, was she not made acquainted with the result? Why did no one come to her to ease her anxiety, with the assurance that Harry's hopeful anticipation were to be fulfilled?

A hasty, heavy step on the stair made her start. It was her father's step, and she trembled for what was to come. She tried to assume a calm, self-possessed look wherewith to meet him, but signally failed, and was nervously unable to raise her eyes from the ground when he strode into the chamber.

"So, Lillias," he sternly said, "this is a pretty conspiracy in which you have been engaged against me."
"A conspiracy?" she faltered, giving him a swift look that sought to read his mind, and to learn from his face what she had to expect. The black cloud which burned on his knitted brow warned her that fierce passion possessed him.
"Ah, a conspiracy. You knew of your brother's mad act; you knew he was married, and to whom. Dare you deny it?"
"No, father, I dare not, because it is true. I did know."

"You did, and you concealed from me? What excuse have you to make for such deceit?"
"I knew you would be displeased, and therefore..."
"Ah, you knew the cause I had to be displeased, but my feeling was of no account with you. You and your brother have seem to come to the conclusion that I am one to be thwarted, disobeyed and defied. He has succeeded for himself, and now you call him to help you to the consummation of your disobedience."

Lillias sighed, and turned her eyes on the ground.
"You are silent," he observed. "I don't wonder at it. Wickedness such as yours can only make the perpetrator dumb."

She looked up then, and her eye fairly met his. Since he had misinterpreted his silence so, she could not rest under the wrong imputation.
"Your are mistaken, father," she simply said. "If I do not answer you, it is not because I feel condemned. Neither my heart nor my conscience accuses me of having done anything wrong."

"Oh, indeed! It is no wrong to defy and deceive a parent. A lie is not always spoken, it is sometimes acted; and you have been playing false to me—hypocrite."

"No, father; I have been neither false nor hypocritical. I never told you what was untrue, or professed what I did not feel. If you have not had Harry's confidence or mine, we are not to blame."
