MOTOR-BOATING. In the boathouse was Uncle's new motorboat, and Clarence and George had been given permission to take their sister Ruth for a ride. They heaped in the pillows on which the little girl comfortably settled herself and spread out her clean white dress, while they started the engine. A minute later the wheels began to whirr and cut they glided on the calm lake.

They had been told not to be gone but somehow time just seems to fly with little folks, though Clarence, who was quite grown up (he was 14) and should have known better than to stay so long.

All unnoticed, clouds had beer piling up till now it began to rain. It was too far to go back home, so they ran the boat up a tiny creek, thinking the overhanging trees would shelter them. It poured so hard it came right through the leaves and in the midst of their ducking the boat ran aground in the shallow water.

Of course, I can write, but it is difficult to put on paper one's guesses and surmises at the trickery that is going on."

The words were scarcely uttered ere a wild notion leaped into Evelyn's brain. Why should she no tgo to Lagos? She might be able to clear away some of the doubts and misgivings that must have gathered around Warden's name. Above all else, if there was news of him, it would surely reach the officials there long before it became known in England.
