

so few present. If it is the Graduates' Institute, why don't they come to it?

There are probably many reasons why they do not, but we cannot help hoping that the re-union hereafter may be one in fact as well as in name. Two things seem to give evidence that it may be; one of them is that the time of meeting has been changed to the Spring, when it will be easier for members to attend; and the other, that the programme is to be filled up by graduates. We think this last a timely move. Our professors have given their aid willingly and efficiently in starting these meetings, but we are sure they would be better pleased to listen than to speak, and would be the first to rejoice that the graduates had taken the meetings wholly into their own hands.
