

prospect is not pleasant for Europeans, still less for the few Americans who are not so blinded by military passion as to be unable to see that peace, liberty, prosperity, and progress are utterly incompatible with such an army and with the pecuniary burdens that will be necessary to support it. — Times Cor. RECRUITING IN MASSACHUSETTS.

Northampton, July 13, 1862. To the Editor of the Irish-American.

Dear Sir—Large and patriotic meetings have been held here on the nights of Friday and Saturday, 11th and 12th, for the purpose of securing enlistments in answer to the President's call for 300,000 additional volunteers. Resolutions were offered by Erastus Hopkins, of this town, amongst which was one offering $3,500 as a town bounty to a company of 100 men. After a long debate as to the bounty which the town would pay, it was voted, with scarcely a dissenting voice, that each man should receive, on enlistment, a town bounty of $70. During the debate which took place on Saturday night in regard to the bounty which the town would pay, some said the laborer was worthy of his hire, and would have each soldier, on enlistment, receive a town bounty of $70. Mr. Maltby, a Western gentleman, residing in this town, rose, and in terms of the deepest indignation reproached the Yankees for "the time wasted in deliberating about dollars and cents—how much they could hire men for to fight the battles of this their glorious country, whilst their liberties and institutions trembled in the balance." Mr. Maltby said, "Is this Yankee patriotism, to stand here all day deliberating on how much you can hire poor Irishmen for to fight the battles of your country? Why don't you go yourselves? You leading men, why don't you lead them? Now, sir, since the President called for 300,000 additional volunteers, I have not heard of even one man in Northampton who has yet offered his services. How many are there here to night ready to go? I call on all who are ready now to rise." At this word one man rose. He (Mr. Maltby) asked him his name, and, on being told, he said, "Mr. H—, I thank you in the name of myself; I can't thank you in the name of Northampton, and, Mr. H—, I have $50 in the Northampton bank for you when you call for it. Mr. Chairman, if Northampton submits to a draft, my bones, which physicians say will soon rest in the grave, shall never repose in Northampton Cemetery." Here there was long and continuous cheering. Mr. Maltby turned round and told them to "wait until he had done." Now some one called for his views on slavery, upon which there was a loud hiss. Mr. Maltby was about to sit down when your humble servant said, "go on, go on," which was repeated all over the house. Mr. Maltby then told them to let slavery alone, and also told them that there are slave States that have more men in the Union army than they have. Mr. Maltby concluded amid loud and long continued cheering. There were six men who enlisted and the meeting dissolved. Your humble servant was appointed recruiting officer. I am the first Irishman, I believe, that got any kind of an appointment from a town meeting here. You may guess the rest.

I am, dear sir, yours, respectfully, WILLIAM SPAFFERY, Northampton, Mass.

HOW HE WAS ANSWERED.—A Mr. Cortland Parker is the prosecuting attorney at Newark, (Essex County,) New Jersey. He lately addressed a "war meeting" in the neighboring town of Orange. That he did not make out much may be inferred from the following report from the Newark Journal:—"He had listened to Mr. Chamber's allusion to Northern traitors with much pain, and was grieved to know that many sympathizers with the rebellion were to be found in New Jersey. In this very county he had every reason to know in his official capacity, that a conspiracy existed the object of which was to see the rebellion prosper, and to insure the triumph of the South, and put it to the vote of the people of New Jersey whether they would not join the State to those of the South, and be a part of the Southern Confederacy. This announcement was hailed with loud cries for the name of the persons alluded to. Mr. Parker said he would name the men and they would recognize them as men having held high positions. Did they not remember a letter appearing in a paper published in Newark, written by a former Governor of New Jersey, in which the question of carrying the State over to the South was freely discussed? He could put his hand upon one man and upon more than one man—in this county whose chief desires were to see the Southern Confederacy triumph over the free Government of the North. Oh, how he wished he could put his hand upon that paper which is continually preaching that this is an unholy war—an Abolition war a Black Republican war—and is day after day saying everything that is outrageous and contrary to law and order. After denouncing the man and his companions who, he said, were now meditating upon the point whether New Jersey is not to join the Southern Confederacy, Mr. Parker proceeded to urge upon every man to enlist for this war who could not be more useful to the cause at home.

"A voice—Why don't you call yourself?" Mr. Parker said he was now coming to that point: he occupied an official position in that county, and although he might be able to handle a gun—"Another voice—A woman can do that!" Mr. Parker—Yes, and he had almost said that a woman would be as good to the army as himself; but he would use all his best powers to sustain the cause in his official capacity and private actions at home, and to incite others to go. He recognized in the voice that had just spoken a brother of Michael Goreau. Why did he not go and fight with his noble countrymen? He also recognized a foreign tongue which indicated the speaker a countryman of the gallant Sigel. Why did he not also join the ranks with his brave countrymen? "Trouton—I want you to go first."
